WHen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theoeles, a Greeke, being driven vpon that coast by an Easterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had beene thought fabulous, being deliuered only by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, and proposed vnto them the benefit of this eafic conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theoeles was as litle regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore hee tooke the same course, that Columbus afterwards did. 40 Hee ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the noble Athenians (who thought themselves to bee well enough alreadie) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needle and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colonie planted of Eubwans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they curro relates, had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the voide places of the World. was the great Archias of Corinth followed the Eubwans, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citic, teft, and most called afterward * Syracufe: of which, that part only was then compassed with a of all that the

The Port was (for the moft part) entironed with beautifull building; and that part which was without the Citic was on with fides bank: vp, and furtamed with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citie it felfe was one of the greatest of the World; for it shad in compatife (as Kirdus tenerated) which was a without the Citie was one of the greatest of the World : for it had in compaffe (as Strabe reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180, furlongs; which made of our miles about 18. The founth,
About five and fortic yeares after Archies had taken Syracufe; Intipherate and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Creete, brought an Armie into Sicil, eight, Pyrhus; and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did crest that The ninth, magnificent and renowned Citie of Agrigentum, governed according to the Lawes ger, The tenth 20 of the Dortans.

The syraculians also, in the feuentieth yeare after their plantation, did fet vp the being flaine at Citie of Acra, in the Mountaines ; and in the ninetieth yeare Ca/mena, in the Plaines Leanton, at adjoyning; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in length the Ro-Syracufe, they built Camerina; and foone after that, Enna, in the very Center of the redit vnder Iland. So did the Cumani, about the same time, recouer from the Siculi the Citic of the conduct of Zancle, which they had founded in the streight betweene Sicil and Italie. They Marcellus. of Zancle had beene founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorieus the Lace demonian built Heraelia; which the Phanicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, foone after in-20 naded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara: and Zanele was taken by the Messenians; who having lost their owne Countrie, gave the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this

t. II.

Of the gouernement and affaires of Sicil, before DIONYSIVS his Tyrannie.

THe most part of the Cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, tili fuch time as Phalaria beganne to vsurpe the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a deteftable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of braffe, wherein to enclose men, and scortch them to death: praising the device with this commendation; That the noise of one tor-50 mented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a ducreward to the Inventour; by causing the first trial to be made upon him selfe. Hee raigned one and thirtie yeares, faith Eulebius; others give him but fixteene: Howfocuer it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, euen whilest the T yrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their libertie, and enjoyed it long, till There vsurped the government of the Common-weale; at which time al. so Panatius made himselle Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled seuen yeares, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zande or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with divers other of the ancient Inhabitants, he torced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syracufians, and, in the end, got from them, by composition, the Citic of 12 Camerina. But when he had raigned feuen yeares, he was flaine in a battaile against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of Gonernement, from Popular to Ariflocraticall; a preparation towards a Principalitie, whereinto it was foone after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Pholians which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greekes, feated themselves in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable fuccesse, became Lord of Gela. Hee, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possestion of Gela, tooke the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracule, 22 betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armic to the fuccour of the Gouernours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeede) the most famous, that energonerned the Syraculians. This change hapned in the fecond years of the threefcore and twelfth olympiad; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of

There, who had also vsurped the state of Agrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasphulus: to the first of which hee gaue up the Citic of Gela, when hee had obtayned the Principalitic of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauailed in the strengthning, beautifying, and amplifying of syraenfe. He defaced 20 Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracufians who built it; and brought the Citizens to Syracufe. The Megarians that had moved a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer fort he brought to Stracisse; and the people he fold for flaues. In like manner dealt he with other places upon like occation. Not long after this, There, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossely Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Meffena, Father-in-law to Terillus : and Gelon also was sollicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilear, were ouerthrowne by Herod. & Died. Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedamonians fent for fuccour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellespont. Hee, for their reliefe having armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neverthelesse to fend them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sca, or by Land. So he vied to their Embaffadours only this faying, That their Spring was withered; accompting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greeke Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great loffe received, fearing the invalion of their owne Countrie, fent to Gelon by their Embaffadors, to defire peace swho graunts it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not facrifice their 50 children to Saturne; That they should pay him two thousand talents of siluer; and present him with two armed ships, in figne of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata; Gelon's wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicil in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the Gods, and creeted others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subjects, heleft the World, and left for his Successiour his brother Hiero. Philistus and Punie report, That, when his bodie was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and fuffered himfelfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded; a man rude, cruell, couctous, and so su-10 spicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conversation which hee had with simentales, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the Hudie of good Arts. Divers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to inuade Sicil, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Gracians, against him. Hee also ouerthew in battaile Thrasydaus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end hee lost the love of the Syracusians; and after he had raigned eleuen yeares, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thra/jbulus, who 20 became a most vnjust and bloudie Tyrant. Thrasphulus enjoyed his Principalitie no longer than ten moneths. For, not with standing the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracufe by the Citizens, to whom, being besieged in deradina, he restored the gouernement, and was banilhed the Iland. From whence he failed into Greece, where he died a private man.

And now had the Syracusians recovered against heir former libertie, as all the reft of the Cities did, after which they had neuer fought, had the Successiours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalitie of Syracufo. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answere the acquisition. Where a 30 liberall, valiant, and aduised Prince, hath obtayned any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a private man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behough the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and arte, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere shee could cleanse her selfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her felfe, and held her felfe free, well neare threefcore yeares, to the time of Dionylius; though shee were in the meane while greatly indangered, by a Citizen ofher owne,

Now, to preuent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they 40 deuifed a kinde of banifhment of fuch among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Oftracifine. They called this their new denised judgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein enery one wrote vpon an Oliue leafe (as at Athens they wrote your (hells) the name of him, whom hee would have expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for fine yeares. Hereby, in a short time, it came to passe, that those of judgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able either supprest or thruit out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yer felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselues. And good reason they had so to doe;

50 feeing there is nothing to terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessitie taught them to abolish it, and restore agains the wifer fort to the Government; from which, the Nobilitie having practifed to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Pucetius, King of the Sicilius, that inhabited the inner part of the lland (who had alreadic taken Enna, and fome other of the Gracian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Armic of the Argragatines) the Syraculans fent forces against him, commanded by an unworthic Citizeno of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde Ducettus, against whom he was imployed, as he did to see from the Armic he led, as so one as Ducettus presented him battaile. So, for want of conduct, the greatest humber of the Syraculans perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they leuic other troups: by whom, in conclusion; Duestun being beaten, submitted him. felse, and is constrained to leaue the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere hee to returned againe, and built the Citie Collators on the Sea-lide.

Ducetim being dead; all the Greeke Cities did in a fort acknowledge System(e):

Trinsta excepted; which also by force of armes, in the fourescore and lift Olympual, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being opprest by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the fixt yeare of the Peloponne lan Warre. In this fuite they preuailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to fuccourthem, under the leading of Laches, and Charwades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with fome supplies brought 20 by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they inuaded the Territories of the Syraculians, and their Partilans; wanne and loft divers places; tooke Mellana; and, in the feventh yeare of the Peloponnelun Warre, loft it againe. They also, at the same time, attempted Himers, but in vaine. The fire of this querrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which inuaded each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had wearied themselues on all bands, and yet could fee none iffue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduite of the athenians, came to an accord with the Syracustans, and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themselves in Sicil, by the divilion and civill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by 30 the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the cufrome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laied an heavie fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines, and Syraculians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leantium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppress the Egestans; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catamans: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians undertooke the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedamon was fent 40 to the Syracustans. The Lacedamonians dealt plainely, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their fuccour, being in diffresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were fo great, as discouered their intent to bee none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not believe their owne cies, which prefented vnto them a Flect, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this Expedition, the Citie of Athens had ingaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatneffe of the enterprife, but the neceffice of finithing it in a floot 15 place of time. For the Lacedemonians (as hath alreadine been effected in due place) flood at that time in fuch broken termes of peace with Athens; a differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessaristic either to spreno cold in this great expedition, or alreagether to sprehar it; which was likely to be hindred by wars at home, if their proceedings were flack abroad. And furely, had not the defire of the Athenian beene ouer-pathonate, the arguments of Nitian had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a bineffle, and to referue their forces for a more needful vie. But yong consiles prevailed, against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of saletie than of honour.

Of this butinede, mention hath beene alreadie made, in that which wee have written of the Pelapennessaw are. But what was there delinered in general termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequences doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Stall

10 was like to haue felt a great connerlion.

Though aliabiaces had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voinge; yet Nicias, together with Aliabiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

Thele had commillion and direction, as well to fuccour the Segefians, and to reelablish the Leonines, call out of their places by the Synaufians; as also, by force of armes, to subject the Synaufians, and all their adherents, in Sial, and compell them bytribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirtie Gallies, and fine thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirtie Thips of burden, which transported their victualls, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, it intimans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, size than 16 c. 9.

thouland Megarians light armed, with thirtie horfe-men.

With these troups and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegian refuse to give them entrie; but fell them victualls for their monic. From thence they fent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing, for their fakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answeres, that thefe Egestans were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false showes of gold, having in all but thirtie talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and 20 allied vnto the Leontines, refuled to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduleth to depart towards the Selmuntines, and to force them, or perswade them, to an agreement with the Egeflans; as likewife to fee what difburfements the Feeflans could make; and so to return again into Greece, and not to wast Athens in a needleffe warre. Alcibiades, on the other fide, would follicite the Cities of Sicil to confederacie, against the Syracusians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto reflitution of all that they had taken from the Leantines. Lamachus, hee perfwades them to affaile Syracufe it felfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprize Carana: and there they take new counfaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egelia, who 40 received from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twen. tie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Hand. Thus, the Sommer being spent in idle consultations, and vaine attempts, the Athemans prepare to affaile Syracufe. But Alcibiades having been accused at home, in his absence, was fent for back by the Athenians, to make his answere : and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachie. These Commanders obtaine a landing place, very neare vnto Syracule, by this deuile,

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catama, whom they trust; and instruct himsto promise who the Syracusems, that here would deliburate their hands all the Albenium, within Catama. Hereupon the Syracusems draw thitherward with their 50 best forces. But in the meane while, the Albenium, setting faile from Catama, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at faire case, and for title themselves against the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusems had the losse; but the Albeniums, wanting horse, could not pursue their victoric to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refirsh their Armie at Catama, for the winter-se son.

From thence they made an attempt vpon Mel/ana, hoping to haue taken it by anintelligence, but in vaine. For Authrades had discourred such as were Traitors within the Citieto the Mel/mians. This he now did, in despight of his owne Citizens the Athenans; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to haue put him to death, or to haue banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedemonians, and to them hee gaue mischieuous counsaile against his Countrie. While this Winter yes lasted, the Strankins send Embassadours to Lacedemon, and Covinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sial, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Pelopannejus warre) the Athenius in Sicil, faile from the Port of Catana, to Categorae, for faken of the Inhabitants; from whence forraging the Countrie, they obtaine fome finall victories ouer the firagling Syracufous: and at their returne to Catans, they receive a fupply of two hundred men at armes, but without horfe, which they hoped to furnish in the lland; from the Segeflus, and other their adherents: they were also frengthned with a companie of Archers, and with three hundred talents in monie.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neare Syraey/e, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syraey/ans, that fallied to impeach their intrenchments, 10 They also received from their Confederates four hundred horse men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at armes. Syraey/e was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any fuccours could enter, but such as were able to force their passes the statement of their passes of their best Commanders, was flaine.

In the meane while, Gylippus, and Pythan, with the Lacedamonian, and Corinthian forces arriue, and takel and at Himera. The Citizens of Himera: and of Golda, together with the selimantines, opine with them, fo that with the feand his owne troups, Gylippus aduentured to march ouer-land towards Syracafe. The Syracafians fend a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The whenians prepare to engounter them, expecting his arriual neare vinto the Citic yon a place of aduantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the syracafian horse-men could not come to sight in those streights: but some after, Greatafian horse-men could not come to sight in those streights: but some after, Greatafian horse-men could not come to sight in those streights with some after, Greatafian horse-men could not come to sight in those streights with one after, Greatafian his Campe. Whereupon Nacius made the state of his affaires knowned by his letters, to the Athenians, shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be clost, together with the small Armier ermaining. The selecters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Eurymeden, and Demossibles, to joyne with Nacius: the one they dispate prefertly with some supply; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylippus at Syraense, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good fuecesse: but in conclusion, he tookes from them their Fort, near vinto Syraense, at the Promutorie, called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their promitions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Atenians themselues, in Greece, were (in effect) besseged within Athens, by the Leechemonium; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the warre in Sicil, and dispatched away tremosshums with new succours. Temosshums, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Pelymthes the Corinthian, with his sheet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil, the one to succour Nicius; the other, Gylippus. The losse between ethem was in effecte yo quall; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Arislem had selided the Athenians in the great Portos Syneuse, and in Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demossher.

rest arrived with three-score and thirteene Gallies, changed with foot-men; and (blaming the flouth of Nicias) he invaded the Systamians, the same day that he arrived. But he made more halte, than he had good speede, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great losse. Hereupon Demostlibutes and Eury medon, determine to rise vp from before Systamse, and returne to the succour of Athems: but Nicias disputed to the contrarie, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Systamse, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoeuer Niehn his intelligencewas; vpon the arrivall of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenius had all consented to depart, and to ologe act Cassan; had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding saw sat hough; ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this supersition cost them deare. For the Sysacusium, Luck Lomonium, and Corinthaus, with threefore and seventeene saile of Callies, ented the great Port of Sysacus; wherein the Athenium's kept their sleet, and whereon they had fortified them selues. The Athenium, in the same Port, encountred them with source or and sixe Gallies, commanded by Eusymedown; in which the Athenium sheet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eusymedown shaine. Now, though it were so, that the Sysacus were beaten by Sea, in which sinde they thought themselves innincible, they were wonderfully cast downer. For it was well said of Sylpzops; to the Syszussians; When any people doe finde themselves canquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they persuade themselaes that they exceede all others, they not only loose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenium, besides the Gallies funck and wrackt, had seuenteene taken, and posses by the enemie: and with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, having drawne them within a Palsado, in one corner of the Port, vnadussedly: for it is as contrarie to a Sea-warre, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plaine field against horse; the one substituing, by being at large; the other, by cole imbattailing.

The Syrachims, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, refolue to imprifon to them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; fillingthe Out-let with all manner of Vessels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double rasks of Gallies break through the Syrachian fleet; which lay but single, because they were forst to range themselses strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laied behinde them agains certaine ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that is any of their Gallies were sunke; or the chaine, which joyned them to their sellowes, broken; the Athenians might yet finde themselses, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenians might yet sinde

42 themselves, a second time, intangled and arrested. I o dilorder allot those Arbeitan Gallies, which came on in torme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a passinge, the Streamins had left within these Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certaine number of look ones, to stop their course and furie. For where the way of any vesfell, ving our corsules, is broken, and their speede fore-slowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other fide, the Alhenians knew that they were viterly loft, except with an invincible refolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats or (at leaf) force a paffage through them in fome part or other: which they refolute to hazard, with all their flipping (to the number of one hundered and ren, of all forts) and with all the strength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian steet, ere they came to force the bridge, as albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stopt by the ships without, and assaulting the other loose Gallies of the Syraussaus, which were purposely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or lunke. Three great disaduantages the Athenians had : the first, that fighting within a Hauen, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no roome to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the fecond, that having over-pettered their Gallies with Souldiers, who yield offenting armes of darts and flings, they had not place upon the decks to firetch their armes: the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paffage, by which they might faue themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no leffe terrible than the confution; the flaughter great on all fides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard But in the end, the Athenians, as many as furnised, were beaten back to the Land, 10 with loffe of threefcore of their Gallies, broken, funke, or abandoned. The Straettstans did also loose twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Cornellians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port. faued themselues by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Lemosthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained: and while the Syracufians were triumphing, and made fecure by their prefent victorie, to fet vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens, This was no ill counfaile. For, as we have heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that have beene victorious) that have neglected the speedie 20 profecution of a beaten enemie; fo might we produce many examples of those, who, having flept fecurely in the bosome of good successe, have been suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and have therby loft againg all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demostheres: Others say, that the Sea men were against it. Whereupon abando ning their Gallies, they all resolue to march ouer land to the Cities of their Consederates, till some more fauourable fortune should call them thence. On the other fide, Gylippus, and other the Lacedemonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermoerates, exhort the Syracufians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Atheniais 30 might make retrait. But many were wearie, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the prefent. Which humour in fome of our Commanders at Cadez, loft vs both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracufian, finding it a loft labour, to perswade his Countrimen to any hastic prosecution, denised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee should draw them willingly out. He fent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Wicins and (after they had affored him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over-haftily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleaging that the Syraculians had lodged their Ar- 40 mie, which could not long flay there, vpon the passages and places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nic as easily beleeved, and put off his journie to the third day. For men, newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wife; and to them, every thiftle in the field, appeares, by night,

The third day (leauing all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and purfued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were fick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest marchaway, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the Riuer of Amapus, not withstanding the opposition of their enemies. Bur being 50 euery day charged in their marches, and by the Synaushan horse men, beaten in from forraging, and promision of foode, they grow weaks and hearths (E. The Synaushans also possesses) which they were to passe towards Comerina, and thereby force them to fall back againe towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could : being vnable to proceede in their journie intended. Many hard thifts they made, in difficult paffages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as having none other meanes to eleape from the enemie that purfued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmishing. To keepe all in order, Aicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vantgard; and Demosthenes conducted the Rearc. At the River Erineus, Nigias takes the flart of a whole nights march, leaving Demostheres to make the retrait: who being incompassed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worfe to than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demofthenes being diffolued, they purfue Nicias with the greater couragewho being vtterly broken, vpon the paffage of the River Asinarus, rendred himfelfe to Gylippus, vpon honelt conditions. Gylippus fought to preferue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicios, as a noble enemie to the Lacedemonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they received at P. lus by the Athenians, had faued the lives of the vanquilhed; Demolihenes, as one that had done to Lacedomon the greatest hurt. Hermoor ates also the Commander of the Syracu/ian Armie, diffwaded the rest, by all the arte he had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after to noble a victorie. But the cruell, and the cowardly fort, (co-20 wardife and crueltic, being infeparable paffions) preuailed, and caused these braue Captaines to be miferably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to bee sterued in lothfome prisons; and the rest fold for slaves. This was the successe of the Siestian warre; which tooke end at the river spinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egeflans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syraculans, fought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their Vaffalls. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet confidering the prosperitie of the Syraculians, 30 and their late victories ouer the Athemans, they stand a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracustans, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolue vpon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Seinuntines, they send Embaffadours to Syracufe: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syraculians approved the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no fuch appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracufians, 40 with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer totrouble them, by interpoling as Arbitrators, in a bulines, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracule; and the Syraculians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthagintans would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand menis fet out from Carrhage, vnder the conduct of Hamnhal, Nephew to that Amiler, who (as you have heard before) was ourethrowne with the great Carthignian Atmie at Himera by Gelon. Humihal was exceeding greedie of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of 50 them having beene flaine by the Himerans; the other by those of Seemen. Both these Cities, Hemihal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, fackt tienn, and burne them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amile was flaine, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates,

Hermocrates, who had lately beene Generall of the Syracujum forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedamonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein hee did great seruice. All the honester fort within Syracule were forie for the injurie done vnto him. and fought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicil, gathered an Armie of fixe thousand; with which he beganne to repaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to winne the love of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was adulsed to seize you a Gate of Syracule, with some strength of men; wherby his friends, within the Towne, might 10 have the better meanes to rife against the adverse partie. This he did : but presently the multitude fell to armes, and fet vpon him; in which conflict hee was flaine. But his fonne-in-law, Dionyfus, shall make them with Hermocrates aliue againe.

Of DIONYSIVS the Tyrant : and others, following him, in

THE Syracusums had enjoyed their libertie about threescore yeares, from the death of Thrasybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Disnyssius was railed up by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltie towards strangers, as of their ingratitude, towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionifins, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or diffrace: which custome they must now bee taught to Dionylus obtayned the Principalitic of Syracufe, by the fame degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuseit selfe. For, being made Preter, and commanding their Armies against the Carthagi- 30 nians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then beganne he to follow the example of Pififiratus, that made himfelfe Lord of Athens; obtaying a band of fixehundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his private enemies, being traiteroufly affected to the State of Syracule, had laid plots how to murder him. because of his good services. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alleaging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to affure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had beene banished, which were the best men of syracuse; and these were afterwards at his denotion, as obliged vnto him by fo great a benefit. His first fauour, among 40 the Syracufains, grew from his accufation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to raigne ouer their betters : wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to breakedowne, as fetters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it under fafe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizenshad found whereat hee aimed. But what they faw, the people would not fee : and fome that were needie, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to huntafter the tyrannie; being but fine and twentie yeares of age when he obtayned it : belike, it was his defire to raigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was 50 much good provision, and vnder it the Gallies were mored. This hee obtained by allowance of the people; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare: The Armie; the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needie fort within Syracuse, that could not thrine by honest courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his establishing the faction, raigning at that present; were wholly affected to his affiltance. Having therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, faue to affure what hee had alreadie. Hee strengthned himselfe by divers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionylius, his Succeffor, the other, Ariffomache, the daughter of Happarinus, and lifter to Dion, honourable menin Syracuse, which bare vnto him many children, that served to fortifie him with new alliances.

CHAP.I.S.4. +.4. of the Historie of the World.

Yetit was not long, ere some of the Syracustans (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noveltie of his Rule. But their enterprife was more passionately, than wifely gouerned. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Siedian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians wasteall, that hee might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it instamed them with a delire to free themselves from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched halfily to Syracufe, where they found friends to helpe them : there they forced his Palace, ranfacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof thee poisoned her selfe. But he followed their heeles a-20 pace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take revenge, by making a speedie riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, no, not of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnstript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people, that ever raigned in any State; and withall, the most vnrespectively cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the reft; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Intwerpe: therein he lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then beganne to make warre upon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay 30 before Herbeffe, an in-land Towne, the Syracufisms rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie hee recoursed his Citadell: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Cambanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, hee againe recovered the masteric over the Syracustans. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their Haruest, hedilarmed all the Townes-men remayning; and new threngthned the Fort of the lland, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threefcore thousand labourers, hee finished in three weekes; being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many 40 fwords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corflets, and all other sutable armes. Which done, he fent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfecbled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sieil, he would make warre vpon them : and, not flaying for answere, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phanician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second, did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with fourescore thousand foot and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to fea, with two hundred Gallies and fine hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yeelded vnto him; saving P.snormus, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyre, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wonne Motya 50 by affault, and put all therein to the fword; but before Egeff hee loft a great part of his Armie, by a fallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himico arrives; but, ere he tooke land, he loft in a fight at Sea, with Legtines, fiftie thips of warre, and fine thonfand Souldiers, belides many thips of burden. This notwithstanding, heerecouered againe Metyavpon his first descent. From thence marching towards MefJena, he tooke Lypara, and (foone after) Messena, and raied it to the ground. Now beganne Dionifius greatly to doubt his cltate. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territorie of the Leantines, by which hee supposed that Handice would paffe toward Syracufe, and he himfelfe tooke the field againe, with toure and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilto had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and fending Mago with the other by Sea: he fent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Ma. go. But Leptines was veterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were flaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lott. It is very strange, and hardiv credible, which yet good Authours tellys, That one Citic should becable to furnish fine hundred faile of thips, and two hundred Gallies: (tor, fo many did Syracule arme in this warre) and more thrange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanio was the most notable, we heare of no fuch number loft; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ever happed in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to beliege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie faile of thips, and threefcore and fine Gallies : for the furnishing of which fleet, he fought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italico. But in old times it was the manner to carrie into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, 20 of all that could beare armes, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not fo; neither, indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dionyfius postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it : Himileo followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aide from the Laced amonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himfelfe to Sea, to make prouision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twentie of the Carthegintan Galies, and linke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne fuccesse prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; having also at the present weapons in their hands; they confult how to recouer their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacians the Lacedamonian relified them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that the 3: plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carth iginians; as it is said, that aboue an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, fets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having flaine great numbers of them, foreeth Himileo to defire peace. This peace I ionyfius fold him for a great fumme of monie, on condition, that he should steale away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him : for he was purfued, and I ft many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themfelues, were (after their fubmission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

Many fuch examples of perfidious dealing base I noted in other places, and can hardly forbeare to deliver vnto memorie the like practices, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monfieur de Poles, was very furable to this treacheric, wherewith Disnopfus purfued timileo. I was prefent, when Te Poles related the injuried one vnto him. He had rendered St. John & Angelie, to the French King Chiefe the mirth, who befleged him therein. Heer endred it, vpon promife made by the faith of a King, that he flowed be fuffered to depart in faircite, with all his followers. Yet in prefence of the King himfelfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of divers Lukes and Marfilals of France, he was fer typon and broken in his march; foolied of all that he had; and forced to fauch is life by flight, leaving the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place; the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with ensigned in faith, and with all his goods and prouisions, no whit availing him. It needes not therefore feeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus breake his faith, since

Kings, profetting Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Diomyfus, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edific Messen. Chaso, who faied in Sieil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Enopylius; who is also beaten by the Tunomeniums. A new flupply of tourescore thousand Soulders is sent from Carthageto Mago; but they take egges for their monie, and make peace with Dianysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tunomenium, to this for themselues: whom Dianysius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

He then past into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and four face to hundred cownes, for furnish him with threefoor Gallies, and to put man hundred pledges, for affurance of their future observance of couenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might be liege them, and rune them vtterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, faithing the faith that he had giuen to them; he pretended to want victuals for his Arme, at such that the contract of the source of th

It is refolution was , that if they refused to furnish him , hee would then make their refusall the cause of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of soode, to endure a siege any long time against him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined, at what price source. And great reason he had to take recenge of them, if he had done it fairely, and without breach of faith. For when, in the beginning of his raigne, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wife: they answered, Thatthey had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doer ather pardon ill deedes, than villainous words, 30 collectander the Great forgaue many sharpe knords, but never any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errours. cially in publique.

It is faid, that Hemrie the fourth of France, had his heart mere inflamed againft the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting tunns, that hee vied againft him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sunyam: for he had pardoned ten thouland of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords againft him. The contemptuous words that St. John Parts vied of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counque trait letter of the Romilla Priest, produced againft him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, some after.

To bee short, hee made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towneon all sides, which hee continued to doe cleuen moneths, till hee wonne it by storee. He yield his victorie without mercie; specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking, and rafing of this Citie; and thofe with variable fuccific. For as in one encounter hee flue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: to the sonne of Mago beate him, and i've 50 his brother Leptinas, with sourceene thousand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperitie and Aduertitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had raigned eight and thirtie yeares, he died: fome fay, in his bedde, peaceably; which is the most likely, though others report to therwise. A cruell man hee was, and a faithlesse, a great Poer, but a foolish one. Hee entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, hee gaue order to haue him slaine, or fold for a slaue. For hee could endure no man, that slattered him not beyond measure. His Parastices therefore shield his crueltie, The hate of each men's and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his inflice. True it is, that slatterers are a kind of vermine, which position all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better, than the worthiest and valiantest mendoe: And I wonder not att it, for it is a world: and as our Sautow Christ hath told vs, 10 The World will low her avenue.

To this Dianylius, his sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, hee pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens duers payments, by his Father imposed vnto him less that had fathened vnto himselfe the peoples affections; hee cast off the Sheeps skinne, and put on that of the Wolke. For, being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe; hee caused them all to bee slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dianylius his Father (as hath beene said) 10 had two Wiues; Davis of Learns; and Artistemachea Syracussian, the sister of Dian, which Brother-in-law of his heg greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him: and by Aristomathe he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosyme, he gaue in marriage to his eldert Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the youger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Necce.

This Dion, a just, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercife of vertue, and that hee was wholly given ouer to fenfualitie, preuailed fo much with Plate, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct 30 the yong King. And having perfwaded the King to entertaynehim, he wrought fo well with him, as Dionyfius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrifons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Paralites, that hated Dions seueritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to bee banished out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrells betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dienyfius flood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gal- 40 lies at his owne charge, during the warre against them : his enemies found meanes, by finister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, given of Plate, had tended to none other end, than to foften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time, having furnished fiftie Gallies, under colour of the Kings feruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliver to the Syraculians their former libertie, or to make himfelfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serue the King with 6 great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For 50 they that had serued the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had alreadie beene raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to con-

coine it aright. But these conctons and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Door had, were bold to file his Lone and Liberaltite, Phile and Presimption; and beartned the yong King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoile foolies they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Asjar in Africa, Ferdinana Cortes, one of the brauest men that ener 5g aims brought forth, offered who the Emperour, to continue the slegat his owne charge. But hee had never good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the west Indies, persuaded the Emperour, that Cortes fought to value himselfe about him; and to 10 haue it faid. That what the Emperour could not, Cortes had effected, and was therefore more worthie of the Empire, than be that had it.

CHAP. 1. S.4. +.4. of the Historie of the World.

When him was newly banished, the Tyrang was contented, at first, to fend him thereuenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moucables, at his owne pleasser: not without giving hope, to recall him in thort time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would have beene well pleased to like well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dionyshus made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods; and thereby veged him to take another course; cuento seeke the restitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much love in Greece. This love made him suspected and into rante, that yrant: but it flood him in good flead, when hee fought to raile men, with whole helpe he might returne into Sied. Yet he got not about eight hundred (for hee carried the matter closely) to follow him in this aducture. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syzaufe, as many as should be needfull, that would readily affifthim. Therefore he landed boldly in Sied; marched to Syzaufe sorted the Citie without reliflance; armed the multitude; and wonne all, faue the Citadel.

Distribution was then ablent in Italie; but hee quickly had advertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned haltily to Syracuses: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and forme forecable attempts to recover the Towne, 30 he was faine to depart; leaving yet the Castle to the cultodic of Apolicarities, his eldel fonne. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philipus, comming with a strength control to distribution, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Tion, for the recoverie of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthis men have to anith this, we call the fame reward, that all worthie men haue had from popular Effates. He was diffraced, affanited, and forced to abandon the Citic. He cretireth himfelfe to the Leontines, who receive him with great joy. Some after his departure from Syraufe, new troups enter the Cattle: they failie out, affaile, fpoile, and burnen great part of the Citic. Dion's fent for, with humble requelt: yet, ere he could arrive, Dionfins his Souldiers were retired; and the Townfinen, thinking themfelues fecture, thut the Gates against Lion. But the next 40 night, they of the Cattle fallie againe, with greater furie than ever; they kill Man, night, they of the Cattle fallie againe, with greater furie than ever; they kill Man, hight, they of the Cattle fallie againe, with greater furie than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and fet fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dim comes the fecond time to their fuccour; the loue of his Countrie for mounting all the injuries that he had received. He fets vpon the Garrison of the Caille, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire, every-where kindled with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the fivord, that had well-neare burnt to allies, and depopulated Spreaufe, he recovered the Caille, which the munition and furniture thereof, and fent Apalice-ties, after the within his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best described, and whom he had loued most, gaue an untimely end to his dayes. For he was, some after the had loued most, gaue an untimely end to his dayes. Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionyfius, with the aftiffance of his friends in Italia, recouers his effate, and returnes to Syracufe, driving Nyfaus thence, whom he Fffff 2 found found Governour therein. The better fort of the Citizens, fearing, more than euer, his crueltie, flee to seetes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their affiltance, not only to preuaile against Dionylius; but by the hatred of the Syracustans towards Dionyfius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracufians, being deferuingly afflicted on all files, fend to the Corinthians for fuccour. Icetes also fends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as hee can, from intermedling in the businesse. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were fo ftrong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Csrinth, to land any Armie in Sieil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, 10 more inraged than diffwaded, ferte Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliver Szracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, seeses had entred Syracuse, and, with the helpe of the Carthaginians, drinen Dionyfius into the Castle, wherein hee belie-

Icetes, being himselse a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countric. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he fent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all thines were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captaines adulfed Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, than he had, and were like to compell him, if 20 he would not be perswaded. Timeleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open affembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those areuments, for his returne, which they had vsed to him in private; that hee might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtayned by a few faire wordes, was without loffe, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons defire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the presse; and having set faile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, 30 where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Gouernour. From thence he marched towards Adranum, where furprifing leetes his Armie, hee flue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranic ons joyned with him; and fo did Mamereus, the Tyrant of Catana, Dionyfine also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castie of Syracufeinto his hands: as thinking it better to yeeld vp himfelfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftic daies, after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracufe, and sent Diony sus to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practises, of seetes. For 40 he besieged the Corinthians, within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timeleen.

The Corinthians fend vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundredhorse, which are staid in Italie by foule weather. Icetes is strengthned with three score thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Aligo (all which hee lodgeth within Syracufe) and with an hundred and fiftie Callies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that cuer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citic. With this great Armie, Icetes affaulteth the Caffle. Timoleon fends them victualls, and fuccour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Alago and Icetes doc therefore resolue to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards 50 it, with part of their forces, than Lean, Captaine of the Corinthians, fallicd out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Maga abandoneth

letes, being frighted out of Sieil (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright hims, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Caltle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feede on the graffe, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinih, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are feat out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

But a new florme ariseth. Asarubal and Amilew , Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybeum, with threefcore and ten thou fand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouilions) in a thouland thips of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a P. iner.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boitterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are veterly broken: ten thousand flaine; fine thoufandtaken, with all their carriages and prouifions; among which, there werefound a thouland corflets, gilt and grauen. After this, Timoleon gaue an ouerthrow to Platin vir. Time feetes and, following his victorie, tooke him, with his fonne Eupelemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine; and afterwards (which 20 was imputed to him for great crueltie) he fuffered toetes his wives and daughters to beput to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon leetes, who (after the murder of Dien) had caused Arete, Dions wife, and a yong child of his, with Artstomache his lifter, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe prevailed against Mamerem, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana it felfe. Alamercus fled to Hippon, Tyrant of Mellena: but Timoleon, pursuing him. wonne the towne; delinering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death, The same end had Mamereus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should not palle the River of Lyous. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syra-

30 custains, till his death; and was folemnely buried by them, in the market-place of their Citie : the day of his Funeralls, being for cuer ordayned to bee kept holy a-

After such time, as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionyfins, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the Inhabitants enjoyed their libertic in peace, about twentie yeares. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant failed in fafetic; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But, it was impossible, that a Nation, which neither knew how to governe, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthie to be Kings, to governe them; should any long time sublist.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there flarted vp an Agathoeles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and fo from degree to degree, riling to bee a Preter; finally became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracustans, Many fortunes he ranne, and under-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalitie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man be was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was imploied, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable sertice and on the contrarie, as memorable service for the Margantines against the Sy-

50 racufans. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he fackt Leonium ; and belieged Syracufe fo fireightly , that the Citizens were driven to crave aide, even from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Cartheginians. Amilear was fent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Aguineeles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace betweene himselfe and the Syraculians; binding him felfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the state of Carthage, for ever after. Amilear entertayned the businesse, and compounded the quarrell's betweene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prator; he entertaines five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to beliege Herbita. With these, and with the affiltance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie being also divided into many factions) he affailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and onpolites; divides the spoile of the rich, among the poore; and gives libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to rauish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights. without controlment : the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and firewed the fireets with ten thousand dead carkaffes, belides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further subject to Agathodes, in an affembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent licknesse, by which the common-wealth was vtterly cofumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had administred; and that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratic, by which it had been gourned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to have the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) per-20 force. For as he knew, that he had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, norable, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had affished, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had beene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, faluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene given to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but, the one was of base; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertic from a Common-weale; the other fought only to fucceede in a Monarchie; the one continued his crueltie to the end; theo- 30 ther, after he had obtayned the Crowne, fought, by making of good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the fumme whereof is this. The fame Amilear that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him fine thousand men, to helpe in the maffacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpole of Amilear, to fettle Agathocles in his tyrannie, and to let him vexe and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to paffe, that hee should reduce all Sicil into such termes, as would make it become an easie prev to Carthage. But, when the Cities, confe- 40 derate with the Carthaginians, fent their Embassadours, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (fo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere fallhood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redreffe. Embaffadours were fent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathodes in minde of his couenants; Amilear was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captaine appointed to fucceede in his charge, with fuch forces, as might compell Agathodes to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended, to sauce their Confederates, from fuffering fuch injuries in the future. For that which was past (fince it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilear was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being given, 50 but not calculated; and so reserved, vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilear had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathodes, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made fuch a composition with the Syracusian as gaue him not only meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custome of those, that hope to worketheir owne ends by cunning practises; thinking to deale fubtilly, and finely, they fpinne their threads fo fmall, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilear faw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into fo much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his fore-22 goers had taught him; and, for feare of fuch a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what fort he thought best. This desperation of Amilear ferued to informe Agathoeles of the Carthaginians intent. He faw they would not be deluded with words, and therfore refolued to get the flart of them in action. He diffembled no longer; but, in stead of spoile and robberie, made open warre ypon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sieil his owne, ere the Curthaginian forces arrived : which thinking to have encountred an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and give them tharpe entertainement. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their

20 bufineffe vndone, and returne into Africk. The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, euen whilest it was yet within kenning of their Citic. But Amilear, the sonne of Gifco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wrack, was bold to passe ouer into Sicil, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agatheeles was soone readie to examine the cause of their comming. Many skirmilhes passed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracufun had the better. But his good successe begat presumption; whereby he loft a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduer fe chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vp-held by great 20 circumspection. The warre was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathoeles was closed up, and driven to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be judged to have found him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracufe, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchifed flaues, or bafe and needie people; helpers in establishing the present Gouernement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoile, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well obferued, and (withall) fo fearfull, that they durst not stirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine 40 was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessitie, Agathocles aduentured vpon a strange course, which the euent commended, as wife. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessells that rode in the Hauen; and committing the gouernement of the Citie to his brother Antunder, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought him selfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the belieged from iffuing forth.

Now, at fuch time as Agathoeles was readie to depart, aduertisement came, that many (hips of burden, laden with corne, and other prouitions, were drawing neare 50 vnto Syracufe. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise faile, and launch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agathoeles, iffuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to give convoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled back into the Citie, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthagimans, as long as day would give them light. In the meane scason, the victual lers were gotten into Syracase; which was the more plentifully relieved by their comming, for that Agathacles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived; first, that by pursuing two sleets at once, he had missed of them both, and scoondly, that Agathacles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were steel, and to attend so well youn them, that they should not have leisure to doe missed in some other past.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathodes (whether by chance, or by relation to of fuch as had metwith him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after fixed ayes. He had (at the firft) a great flart of them; fo that (belike) they rowed hard; and wearied them felues, in feeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, and beat them; and, hauing funke, or taken many, draue the, refit to flie which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them understand, That there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (faid he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceive that there 20 is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promife and make good, by letting them have some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one alreadie Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (referuing one or two, to vie as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, faue only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; 30 which after they had throughly facked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make refissance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilear is broken, and his whole Armie destroied in Sicil. This impression so dismaics them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they seare, and know not what. They suspect Amilears faith, who had suffered Agathoeles to land in Africk : they suspect their principall Citizens at home of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemie; they raife a great Armie, and know not vnto whole charge they may fafely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanne, and Bomil- 40 can's great enemies, and therefore the more valikely to configire againft the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathacles. But it seldome happens, that diffension between Commanders produceth any fortunate euent. Necessitied drauge Agathacles to fight: and the courage of his men, resoluted to deale with the whole multitude of the Carting initials, made case the victoric against the one halfe of them. For Bomilear would not fitter ibut suffered Hanne to be cuttin peeces.

The reputation of this victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthzginian focietie to take part with Agathedes: who purfuing his victoric, winnes many Townes, and fends word to Spraulf of his good fuccelle. The Carthzginians 50 alfo fend into Sial, willing Amilear, their Generall, to fuccour the flate of Africk, which was in danger to be loft, whileft he was travailing in the conquest of Sial, Amlear fends them succeeding the most stem succeeding the thought them for the default transfort; as hoping rather to draw Agathedes back into Sial, than to be drawne home by one, that could fearce retaine his owne Kingdome. But the fe good hopes had a bad iffue. He spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered wno the Syracussians: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceined a sidden hope of taking Syracus by Suprise. It was a prette (though tragically accident, if it were true, as Tullar elates it. Amile r had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracus. His fincie begot this dreame, and he belieued it. He made more halte, than good speeds, toward the Citre: and comming ypon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that he had no great cheare to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome pre-

This good fucceffe of things at home, did put fuch courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and file himfelfe King of Africa. He had allured Ophellas, King of the Creations, to take his part, by promifes to deliver the Countrie into his hands: for that (as he faid) it was fufficient vnto himfelfe to have discreted the Cartheginians from Sicil, wherein (alter this warre ended) he might raigne quitely. Ophellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertayned. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did nurder this his affiftant, was found to worker and recommended to the constitution.

and afterwards, by good wordes, and great promifer, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villainie found good fucceffe, and he fo premialed in Africk, that he got leifure to make a flee jint of Stiel. Many Townes in Stiel hadimbraced a delire of recouring their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had fo long been exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. The fe had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Arabosles abated their high spirits, and his good successive many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Stiel he returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archingulus, his sonne, had lost a batterials and which was warfely had ill means to be he himselfe his Armie being Armens.

30 talle, and (which was worfe) had ill meanes to helpe himfelfe; his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Aguhoeles pacified the tumult, by the accuflomed promifes of great bootic and fpoile. It had now beene time for him, to offer peace to the Cesthaginians; which to obtaine, they would (queftionleffe) haue given to him, both monie enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citic had beene dithreffed, not only by this his warre, but by the treafon of Bomilean, who failed not much of making himfelfe Tyrant over them. But ambition is blinde. Agashoeles had all his thoughts fixed youn the conqueft of Carthage it felfes out of which dreame he was awaked, by the loffe of a battaile, not for memorable integrated of any accident therein, as of the firange cuents following it. The Carthage that the proposal is intelled to the second of the firange cuents following it.

49 gmisms, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old faci fixes of children to Saturne: from which they had abfained, euer fince they made pence with Gaba. And now they made choice of fome, the goodlieft of their prifioners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the faid Idoll, in way of thankefulneffe for their victorie. The fire, with which thefe whappie men were confumed, caught hold ypon the lodgings neared vnto the Altar; and fpreading it felfs tarther through the Campe, with the deftruction of many men, caufed fuch a tumult, as is vfuall in the like cafes. At the fame time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pauliton of Agathales. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleening, that the notic in the aduerfe Campe, was a figne of the enemies comming to inuade it.

50 But the Carthagimans had a fafe retrait: Agathoeles, by a fecond errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolved from him, to the Carthagimians, in the laft bittaile; he beganne to affaile them, and was fo flourly relifted, that he loft, in this blinde flight, about four thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neare hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto forme diffruit of his owne fafetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weake tearos. than lately he had knowne how to gouerne his Ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to fteale closely abourd his thips. with his yonger fonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flie into Sicil; thinking it the best course, to shift for himselfe, as wanting vessells wherein to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceiued his drift, arrested him, and put him under custodie : but by meanes of a sudden tumult hee was let loofe, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behinde him. His 10 flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of race canfed not only the common Souldier, but even fuch as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two fonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathodes was extremely base; I neede not vie wordes to proue : That his feare was truly, as all feare is faid to be, a pathon, depriving him of the fuccours which reason offered, the fequele doth manitest. His forfaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse companie, and no longer an Armic to be feared, obtained neuertheleffe a reasonable composition from the Carth eqinians: to whom they fold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathodes himselfe, having loft his Armic, did neuertheleffe, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace 20 with Carthage vpon equal termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discoucred his bloudie nature in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, viged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected; but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. He denifed new engines of torment; wherein firiting to exceede the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of braffe, that should serue to scortch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their miserie. So devillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutish affections. In these mischiefes he was so outragious, that he neither spared 30 Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his estate : it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Countrie, tooke armes against him, and draue him into fuch feare, that he was faine to feeke the love at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might have had in Sieil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phanicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him, honourably, with greatstore of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and filter. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebells, and settled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Steil, he made a voiage into Italie. There he 40 fubdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the life of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great fumme, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their Gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could be believe those to be Gods, that had continually given deafe caresto his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold; all which, and all the rest of his flat, were call away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which be himfelfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A gricuous sick n. If fell upon him, that rot- 50 ted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and tinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, sauc only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Agypt) and her small children : his Nephew, the son e of Archigathas before mentioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, beganne to contend about the Kingdome.

Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them lated wair for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he she his Nnele, and got his Grandfathers Kingdome without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Asystoce with searcand forrow. He saw himselise without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no tauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only heenow held deare, which were, Theogenia, and her children. Therefore hee adusted her and them to slie before they were surprised is for that otherwise they could by no meanes anoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewish he cuen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wetched a case) to imbarke themselfues hashily, and make speech into Egypt. Astertheir departure, whether her herew himselfic into the fire, or whether his disaste consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him, but he ended his life asbasely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as he first begannet:

After the death of **agatheles** it was, that the **Mamortines** his Souldiers traiteroully occupied **Atelfana**, and infefted a great part of the Iland. Then ail fo did the Carthegnians** beginne to renew their attemps of conquering all Stall. What the Nephew of **agatheles** did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perifhed. 20 Forthe Stallans were driven to fend for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of **Agatheles**. But Pyrrhus was foone wearie of the Countrie (as hath been thewed before) and therefore left it; proplecying that it would become agoodly champaine field, wherein **Rome and Carthage** flould fight for fuperioritie. In whish businesse, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our floric will declare.

). V.

A recontinuation of the Roman warrein Sicil. How HIERON, King of Syracufe, for fooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

Hen Appina Claudius, following the advantage of his victoric gotten at Meljama, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Strause, and belieged that great Citic; Hieron found it high time for him to feeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfeby what meanes he could, when they were not in case to giue him atsistance; and forceeing withall, that when once hee

ab adpurchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit fill, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were sighting for the masterie, In this good moode, the new Roman Consulls, CM. Valerius, and C. Ostacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vse of their present advantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Confulls had brought a great Armie into Sieil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syrsunjan held them bushed (which I finde not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed you him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the 50 whole time of their abode in the I land; then was his departure from the friend-ship of Carthage, no less to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should have received all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straying themseliues to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathoeles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare out a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more flack, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire. that both Rome and Syracufe thould weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the calier against them both. Yet indeede, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vttermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into flauerie: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, it they could withdraw it from the partie of their enemies. Belides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured. fo long as he might preserve his owne tyranie: the latter, as a just and good Prince. had no greater defire than to winne the loue of his people, by feeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enjoyed a long and happie raigne; liuing deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans. and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it. 20

How the Romans befrege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Seafight in generall.

Agrigentum was a goodly Cirie, built by IERON, having sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuaills, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his affistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arrived, der conduct of they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the feat of the warre, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The compalls was ten miles about the walls; and it had sometimes in it The Roman Confulls, having made the shadow of the first should be shadown that the shadown of the fer-place of the folial and shadown of the first shadown of the fer-tilities of the folial and shadown of the first shadown of the fer-place from final beginnings, og erect spot and notice. The plenter and the first shadown of the fir luxurie thereof was to great, as it cauted Empedacles to fay, That the A- and Quintus Mamilius, arrive. They goe having there or was to great, as it cause a mytameter to 13), a local was a long state of the great state of the first properties and finding a great state of the first properties of the great state of t and Theaters, Water-conduits, and I'sh ponds: the ruines whereof at though it were flusted with fiftie thouthis day are sufficient argument, that Rome is selfe could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Impiter O'ympius, (by which we find Souldiers. After a while, the time may judge of the Temple it felfe) there was fet out on one fide the full of ha ueft being come, a part of the Roproportion of the Grants, fighting with the Gods, all cut out in p. lifted marble of divers colours; a worke the most magnificent and care, that ever hath brene feene : on the other fide, the warre of Trop, and the en- corne, and those at the frege grow neglicourtes with happend at that fige; with the performages of the fire courtes with happend at that fige; with the performages of the fire cover that were doors in that ware; all of the like beautifull flone, and or equal flatume to the lockies of men in the facilities the court in the courte flower in the standard times; I no men in the facilities the court in the standard times; I no men in the facilities the standard times are considered to the courtes of the standard times are considered to the courtes of the standard times are considered to the standard time partion of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but pettie things, in the end repelled into the towne with nad meere effe. It would require a volume, to experie the magning great loff cibut by the finar tiel to n both (9 and meete of the Taples of the major the finar, Effation, exceed, and Latina, the finar property of the major to the subject of the exquifice Painters , and Caruers , Phidias , Zeuxis , Myron , and Polytle guards , & the befiegedk pt within their the, were to be feene. But in procedie of time it ranne the fame fortune that elother great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamic. Court, Yet the Romans, the better to afties of warre; whereof this warre prefent brought vino it not the leaft. fure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe; and another on the out-fide thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter suddenly by a fallie nor shofe of the Countrie without, breake vpon them vnawares; which double defence kept the affieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victualls, and munitions, whileft the Syracufian supplies the affailants with what they want. The besieged fend for fuccour to Carthage, after they had beene in this fort pent vp five moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclia, to the Welt of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a Citic wherein the Romans had bestowed all their proussion. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no leffe streightly affreged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans : infomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to give them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclia, he makes approch vnto the Reman campe. The Romans resolue to sustaine him, and put themselues in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horse-men to charge their Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne, as broken, till they came to the body of the Armie, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. 30 The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans purfued the Numidians, Hanno gives vpon them, and having flaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

CHAP.I. S.6.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some oportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal, that was belieged in Agrigentum, as well by fignes as meffengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremitie which he indured, was able to brooke fuch dilatoric courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consulls to fight: but, his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, loft the day, and, with fuch as escaped, he recoursed Heraclia. Annibal 20 perceiuing this, and remayning hopelesse of succour, resoluted to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rusht out of the Towne with the greatest part of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without reliftance. The Confulls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: fure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little'a-doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposehenceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good tortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: 40 but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sieil; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to faile ouer into Africk. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and of private men, to couet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vie and fruition of what we have alreadie. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World to this day.

To profecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius, and Titus Octacilius, two new Confuls, aresentinto Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many inland Townes gave themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians 50 keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as also to equal themselves in every kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in shipwrights-craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fine bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to fet vp an hun. dred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fine on enery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke; and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-lands many feates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the fand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, to C. Cornelius, one of the new Confulls (for they changed enery yeare) was made Admirall: who being more in lone with this new kinde of warfare, than well aduised, past ouer to Messena with seventeene Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needes row alongst the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some peece of service. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Governour in Panormus; who being aducrtifed of this new Sea-mans arrivall, fent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies, to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Confull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies and their Confull; he grew no leffe foolish hardie than Cornelius had beene. Forhe, 20 fancying to himselfe to surprise the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; fought them out with a fleet of fiftie faile: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest; for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had loft but seuenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not eafily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertifed of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make hafte to redeeme him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius, Duilius, confidering that the Roman vessells were heavie and flow, the African Gallies hauing the speede of them, deuised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, where 30 by they might falten or grapple themselues with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies fides together. This done, the waightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africa cans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse seruethem, nor their Marriners craft; the Vessells, wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heanier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they, by reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vie their hands. The example may be given betweene one of the long boates of his Majesties great ships, and a London-barge.

Certainely, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skilfull in ma king choice of Vessells to fight in the must believe, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betweene fighting loofe or at large, and grapling. The Gunnes of a flow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre : for by fuch an ignorant braucrie was Peter Stroße lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like fort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been loft in the yeare 1588. if he had not beene better aduised, than a great many malignant sooles were, that 50 found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armic aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; fo that, had he intangled himfelfe with those great and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men upon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwife, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not beene worthie to haue held his head. Here to speake in generall of Scafight (for particulars are fitter for private hands, than for the Preffe) I fay, That a fleet of twentie ships, all good failers, and good ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of flower fayling. For if the fleet of an hundred faile keepe themselues neare together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall 10 back vpon their next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable, or loft. Force them they may casily, because the twentie ships, which give themselues scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may give them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in peeces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vie but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred faile give themselves any distance, then shall the leffer fleet prenaile, either against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that byaduantage of ouer-failing their fellowes keepe the winde and if vpon a Leeshore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall back into their owne squadron, 20 then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it selfe. That such advantage may be taken upon a fleet of unequal speede, it hath beene well enough conceived in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thueydides, which he made to the Syracufians, when the Athenians invaded them, it Thueydil. 6. may cafily be obserued.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatife, for the Lord HENRIE, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared methe labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the loffe of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclypfe of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall wordes and forrowes; I will 30 therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leves loquuntur, ingentes stapent,

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by low and their aduantage of fwift boats, and boording the Romans, have loft fiftie aile of their Gallies : as on the other fide, their enemies, by commanding the Seas, have gotten libertie to faile about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege laied unto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with fome other places.

ð. V.I I.

Diversenter feats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepareto inuade Africk: and obtaine a creat victorie at Sea.

He victoric of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauall triumph, that was euer seene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicil, but all the other Iles betweene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither foone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrarie side , Amilear the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune : and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a part, hee sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Siel, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtayined the trusto f a new fleet, where with hee arrived at Sardinia: the conqueit of which Iland, the Romans had entertayned for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, croffing the Seas from Sicil. arriued in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They fet vpon him vinawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted, himfelfe hardly escaping their danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were foill pleafed with this his fecond vnfortunate voiage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath been faid of old) Nonejt bis in bello peccare; In warre it is too much to offend twice. After this, it was long creany thing of importance was done by the Confulls, till give credit to * Panormus was belieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw Antiquities, which Faxelles, the Cartheginians into the field; being viable to force that great Citie, because of a diligent writthe itrong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and tooke certaine ter, hathletws in his Hildric of Siell; Panomus, now called Palerme, is one of the find Cities that hath been e built in all Europe. For whereas Thurgdides feemes to make it a Enna, Cemerina, Hippana, and o Colonic of the Phanicians; Ramanus, in the lide of treatmen, this, 6, affirmers, that it there, between Panormus and 20 was first, and long before the time which Thurst des fets downe, founded by the Childrens, and Dimascenes. To proue which, he tells vs of two inscriptions upon Messua. The yeare following, marble, in the Hebrew Character, found at Panarma in the time of William the fe- C. But it was rather confederate, than fubice to the Ro- gotten vp : who renewing the mans. For Cicero against Verres, names it among the free Cities of Suil. After Syracufe destroied, it became the first Citie and Regall feat, as well of the Goths light, recoursed from the Carand Saracess in that Hand, as of the Emperours of Conflantinople; of the Normans, thaginians a double number of and sartegor in that trains, as or the Emperior of this day, and is much frequentiers; by which the victoric remaining doubtfull, both chal-lenge it. Now to trie at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred ** The Quin- and thirtie Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fiftie, ** Triremes, queremis are Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolue to transport the warreinto Africk; the Carthaginians, to arhath five men rest them on the coast of Sial. The numbers, with which each of them filled their to draw it; the fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the waters. By Polybius his and fourest an estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and sortie thousand men; Oate, and the and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fiftie thousand: reckoning one hundred Triement, three, and twentic Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers, to cuery Gallie, one with the thought, that other. The Roman fleet was divided into foure parts, of which the three first made the Oxing see the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flancks, rankes of Oares one over another; and the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this been foothey must then have had fine decks, each oner other: which bath seldome been seen in ships of a thousand Tonnes; acither could the third, fourth, and fift rankes, have reached vnto the water with their Oares.

and the third fquadron, the Bafe: the point thereof (wherein were the two Confulls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemie; and the middle space, y.n. congres Their Veffells of carriage were towed by the third fquaoron. After an came of the fourth, in forme of a Crefeent; very well manned, but exceeding tunne : form ne hornes of it inclosed all the third Iquadron, together with the corners of toe and and second. The order of the Carthigmian fleet I cannot conceine by the relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and firetched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haif; a long front of horle, and thinne: which forme, lines the Petroil to prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first out stretched front, their Battalions were more folide. For Amilear, Admira lorthe Carthaginions, had thus ordered them, of purpose, this Gallies having the speede of the Komans; that, when the first fleet of the Romans halted to breake through the first Gastes, the y should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victoric) disorder themselves, and, for eagernesse of taking the Kunne-awaies, leave their other three fquadron farre behinde them. For lo mult it needes fail out, feeing that the third faundron towed their horfe-boats, and victualiers; and the fourth and the Reaceward of all. According to Amilears direction it forceeded. For when the Lomans had charged and broken, the thinne front of the Carthagistan fire fleet, which can ac away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speede ponible, not so much as ioo-king behinde them for the fecond fquadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neare vnto the bodie of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Annes, and by him (at the first) received great losse, till their second squadron came vp, which forced Amneur tobetake him to his Oares. Hanno alfo, who commanded the right wing of the Corbiginian fleet, invaded the Roman Reareward, and prevailed against them. But Anlar being besten off, Marcu Ailius fell back to their fuccour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to fullaine both squadron The Reare being relicued, the Confulls came to the aide of their third Fattalion, which towed their victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the african:

30 but the Confulls, joyning their fquadrons to t, put the Ca the general or that part a loto running. I his victoric fell to the Romans, part y by the hardiness of the ir Souldiers, but principally, for hat Amileo, being first baten, could never after joynch mfelfe to any of his other fquadrons, that remained as yet in fare like lihose of or uniling to long as they fought vponeuen termes, and but quadron to squadron. But Amilear, forfaking the right, thereby left a fe I fourth part of the Raman floot viningaged, and readie to give fuccour to any of the other parts that were opposit. So as in conclusion, the Romansgot the honour of the day : for they loft but for reand twentie of theirs, wheras the Africans loit thirtie that were funke, and hecefcore and three that were taken.

40 Now, if Antlen who had more Gailies than the Romms, had aife divided his fleet into four fquadrons, (befides those that he ranged in the front, to draw on the enemies and to ingage them) and that, while her himfelfs fought with one fquidron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had premailed . But the fecond fquadron , being free came to the refere of the first, by which Amilear was oppress; and milear, neing oppress and feattered, the Confulls had good leifure to relieue both their third and fourth fquadron, and gor the victorie.

Charle the fift among other his Precepts to Philip the second his sonne, where headuifeth him concerning Warre against the In Fo, tells him that in all battailes 30 betweene them and the Christians, he should never faile to charge the Linifas in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the reft. For (faith he) the Imilars, who are alwaies ref rued intire, in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke repoter's his greatest considence; come up in a groff-body, when all the troups, on both fides, are difbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also prevaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triary in flore (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious advantage it hath euer beene found, to keepe some one or two good troups to looke on, when all elfe are difbanded and ingaged.

VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Africk. ATILIVS the Confull propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Ow the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their neet, net take to early at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the Sicil, where Amilear himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they dif- 20 imbarked, and prepared to beliege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa fide; without which all invalions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: but being aduertised, that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all forts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans fend to Rome for directions, and in the mone while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Confulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet, into Italie. According to this direction, Manliss the Confull is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thou- 30 fand African captines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fifteene thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, that were left with Asilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vnwalled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adis. Yet I hold it worthie of relation, that neare vnto the River of Bagrada, This Citie he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he flue, wastaken from not without loffe of many Souldiers, being driuen to vseagainst it such engines of the Tunker by warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the in the yeare Carinaginian Armic, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Bostar, together with 1536. and was Amilear, who had brought ouer out of Sicil fine thousand foot, and fine hundred 42 horse, to succour his Countrie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him which he gaue out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine in charge, to fight. They were carefull to hold themselves free, from necessitie of comming to condhis sonne blowes: yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adisout of his hands. Into keepe fate; rending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the to wit, this Ta-tiege of Adu, they incampe neare vnto him, and strongly (as they thinke) on the Africa: Flight top of an hill; but thereby they loofe the services, both of their Elephants, and of ing, the Key of their horse men. This disaduantage of theirs Regular discouers, and makes vse of and cidia, the it. He affailes them in their strength, which they defend a-while; but in fine the Key of Spaine. Romans prevaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. 50 But two of these philips of Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to * Tunis, a Citie loft, that hee within fixteene miles of Carthage, which they affault and take.

them againe; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we flaid not to pick any lock, but brake open the dores, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire.

By the loffe of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the loffe of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly difmaied. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the Welt, infult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territorie, and force those that inhabite abroad, to for sake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilise findes his owne advantage, and affures himfelie that the Citie could not long hold out : yet he feared least it might defend it selfe, untill his time of Office, that was neare expired, should be quite runne out, whereby the new Confulls were like to reape the honor of obtayning it. Ambition there-

12 fore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vn worthie and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with seare, became now so couragious and dildainefull, that they resolved, either to defend their libertie, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly fent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had paffed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians received neare vnto Adis, gaueit out publiquely, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xantippu

no is fent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himfelfe into the field. The Armie which he led, confifted of no more than twelve thousand foot, and fourethousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wher with the Carthaginians fought for all that they had . Libertic, Liues, Goods, Wiues, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sca, before spoken of, were misse-numbred; the one confifting of an hundred and fortie thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thousand: were it not commonly found, that they which vse the service of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Ro-30 mans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and leuell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be some abated. Their chiefe care was, how to refish the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive back the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the fame end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had been eaccustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subject vinto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed vinto 40 the violence of horse, wherein the enemie did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horse-men, and some light-armed soot, of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beafts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons neuerthelesse persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of dillius out of the field, 50 beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great diffresse; who being forced to turne face every way, could neither paffe forward, nor yet retire; but had much a doc to make good the ground whereon they flood. In the meane while, fuch of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and good array. It was no even match. I heone were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemie vpon equall termes. Here was therefore a great flaughter with little fight: the Romans halfuly recoiling to the body of their Armie, which being furrounded with the enemie, and spent with travaile, fell all to rout, vpon the deleat of these troups, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victorie; destroying the whole Roman Armie, saue two thousand, and taking flue hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Consult. Or their owner her joil no more than eight hundred mercinaries, which were flaine, when the light began, by two thouland of the Romans, that wheeling about, to avoide the Eicphant, bare 10 downe all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. Alitherest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lette her vaffalls, than were the Carthagimans: how infolent focuer they nad beene in their propolition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitic, which sheen one gaue nor fold to any mortall man. With what joy these newes were well-commed, when they came to Carthige, we may cally conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man bath often brought to paffe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no leffe than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Evarpi- 20 DES, Mens una sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equall not one wife minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more enuited than honoured, or for what other

The death of Atilius Regulus the Confull, was very memorable. He was fent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne, if the bulinesse were not essected. When hee came to Rome, and plainely faw that his Countrie should loose by the bargaine: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnessly 30 persuaded to have the prisoners in Africk left to their ill destinies. This done, he recurred to Caribage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancic and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Cartinginians sceme to have judged him an obitinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturalicare, to perferue himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of fome small advantage. What so wer the Carthaginians thought of him; fure it is, that his faithfull observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange 49 of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to have proceeded from a varne glorious frowardnesse rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made foone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worfe bargaine, by fo much as Regulm himfeife was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnific him in this point; we are to confider that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he fuffered with extreme torments, could not be more grieuous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination : saying, That the Eomans descrued to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinarie practise 50 to vse others in the like fort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customarie. It was the Roman fashion, to whip a most to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were fuch, as had alwaies made faire warres with them. Wherefore it feeme : not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall infolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselues.

The confideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the fudden valour, whereinto the Cathagimans feare was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance the like insolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reafonable grace bath beene denied. In fuch cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies; approning the true rules, from which our passions carrie vs away.

In the yeare 1378, the Genorales wonne fo fast upon the Venetians, as they not only draue their Galiles out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it felle. This bred fuch an amazement in the Citizens of Vemee, that they offered vnto the Genowaies (their state reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would hearken to no composition; faue the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdaine, thrust out to Sea with all their remayning power, and affaile Doria with fuch desperate surie, that they breake his fleet; kill Doria himselse; take nineteene of his Gallies, fourescore boats of Palos, and foure thousand prisoners; recouer Chiezza, and all the placestaken 20 from them; and following their victorie, enter the Port of Genea, enforcing the Genomates, basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disaduantage, being besten; which being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeare 1280. when having taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell revenge vpon the Gantois, herefused mercieto the rest; who in all humilitie, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citic, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vnadu. fedly refused, and was resoluted to extinguish them vtterly; theyiffue out of their Citie with fine thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperateresolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruzes (peil-mell) 30 with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe under an heape of straw in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and saued himfelfe. Such are the fruits of infolencie.

I X.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against ATILIVS: How the Romans having lost their fleet by tempeft, resolue to forfake the Soas: The great aduantages of a good fleet in warre, betweene Nations divided by the Sea.

Y the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had beene loft in Africk, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clopes stands out; before which the Carthaginians fit downe, and affaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the loffe of Attins with their forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was belieged make readic a groffe Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fiftie Gallies, commanded by At. Amilius, and Ser. Fuluiw, their Confulls. At the Promontorie of Mercurie two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, fet out of purpose, vpon the bruit of 50 their comming, encounter them ; but greatly to their coft. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and fourteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Cly-Per; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had beene befleged and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this haltie voyage they despile the aduice of the Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the scason threatned some * There is no violent stormes, which ever hapned betweene the rising of Orion, and of the * Dogpar of the start. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned World, which them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coastlo naturation to the certaine times. Stell had no good Ports, wherein to faue themselves vpon such an accident: yet this great victorie was denoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recoursed Rome. The Carthygimans, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Veffells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land. 20 forces lince the overthrow of Ailius. They fend Afdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armic and fleet he arrives at Litybeam; where hee beginnes to vexe the Partisans of Rome. But advertitie doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships;

with which, and the remainder of their late shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerms, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicil, and furround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Servillius, and C. Sempronius, their Confulls. But these wrought no 30 wonders. Some (poile they made upon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to have perished, neare vnto the leffer syrtes, where they were faine to heave all over-boord, that so they might get off then, having with much a doe doubled the Cape of Lilyb.cum, in their paffage from Panormus towards Italie, they loft an hundred and fiftie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the watres favoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with you the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now loft, besides what they loft in fight, foure hundred and fixe ships and galiles, with all the munition and 40

The exceeding damage hereby received, perfivaded them to give over their Nauigation, and their fight by Sea, and to fend only a Land-armic into Sicil, under L. Caalius, and C. Firius, their Confulls. These they transported in some threefcore ordinarie paffage-boats, by the straights of Melfana, that are not aboue a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like fort, the ouerthrow which Addin receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them effecholerickagainst the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeares after they kept the high and woodic grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champian Countries. But this late refolution of for faking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for 50 them to success those places which they held in Sieil, without a Nauie, much lesse to maintaine the warrein Africa. For whereas the Romans were to fend forces from Messans to Exestia, to Lily baum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Siail, making fometimes a march of aboue an hundred and fortie English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the provisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and fortie houres.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauic and Armie, and could not prevaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and failing to the West, landed in Dorfet-fbire, so drawing Edmond and his Armic thither. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcesterto fire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he failed back againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least helpe, which the Wetherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwcaried, and entire, with all the Munition and Artilleric belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have beene able to doe it. Of this, an inflance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breds: 20 making countenance either to befiege Boifledue, or Gertreuiden-Berg; which the enemic (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as foone as the winde ferued, he fuddenly fet faile, and arriving in the mouth of the Menze, turned upthe Rhine, and thence to Ysel, and fatedowne before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over land round about Holland, about fourescore mile, and ouer many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armie had ouer come this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to faile vp the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and failing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulft in Brabant, ere the Spaniere's had knowledge what was become of him. 30 So this Towne healfo tooke, before the Spanish armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulft, fet faile againe, and prefented himfelfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance, and mastred it.

And to fay the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not having the coalts admirably fortified, to defend it felfe against a powerfull enemie, that is mafler of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second, had fully resoluted to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1,89. from presenting Don Antonie, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would have kept off the En-40 glifb, by power of his land-forces; as being too weake at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mightie Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeare foregoing. Surely, it had not beene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to refift our cleuen thousand. But where should this his Armie haue beene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it have beene case vnto the English, to take, ranfack, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations, of the Earle of Altemira, the Marqueffe of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastic leavie of eight thousand, under the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sr. Iohn Norris, and his Affociates: 50 confidering, that the English charged thefe, at Puente de Burgos, and patfing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and purfued them over all the Countrie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of private adventurers, had thus

CHAP.I. S.9. begunne the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would have made the Spaniar as to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their St. Iago, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir John Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armic, into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed : could they have hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Penicha, and march ouer the Countrie to Lysborne, fixe daies journie? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the River of Lysborn to Calcaliz, and there, having wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart?

But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let vs confider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by advantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an inuading Armie may be refilled at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is alreadic handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations vpon Cesars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmative. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our flipping: and comparatively; as, that it is a more fafe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemie to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely, I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemie from 20 treading vpon our ground : wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him wish, that he had staicd at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumflances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positive, Whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemie from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduenture. For the incouragement of a first victorie to an enemie, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monlue, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guienne, 30 they of the Protestant religion; after the battaile of Moncounter, entred that Countrie, and gathered great (trength and reliefe thence; for if the King (faith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable meanes, j euse bien garde a Monsieur l'Admiral, de saire boire ses Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrarie side, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an inuading enemie, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he innaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverse consideration to be had, betweene such a Countrie as France is, strengthned with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And 40 it was of invalions upon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countrie, and the place left to the choice of the Inuaden. Hercunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrie: except eucry Creeke, Port, or fandie Bay, had a powerfull Armie in each of them to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot; and that those twelve thousand be laied in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and fixe thousand at Foulk- 50 flon, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troups (vnleffe some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this prouision, if the enemie, setting faile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boats at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Neffe, and thruit their Armie on shorothere; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat (twentie and four flong miles from thence) rocome time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Ae/le. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston bee abie to docit, who are nearer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemie, at his first arrivall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred that of great Artillerie, and quickly put the first three thoufund, that were intrenched at the Neffe, to runne; or elfe give them fo much to doe, that they shall be glad to fend for helpe to Foulkfton; and perhaps to Margat : wherto by those places will be left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentilh Souldiers arrive at the Neffe, ere the enemie can be readie to ditimbarque his Armie, fo that he shall finde it vnfafe, to land in the face of fo many, prepared to withfland him; yet must we believe, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (having libertie to goe which way he lift) under couert of the night, fet faile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainely, there is nothing more calle than to doe it. Year the like may bee faid of Weymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South coaft. For there is no man ignorant, that thips, without putting themselves out of breath, will calify 10 out runne the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne volent point en joste; Armies neither fle, nor runne post, faith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of flips may be seene at Sunne-Set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in fixe daics. Againe, when those troups, lodged on the Sca-shores, thall be forced to runne from place to place; in vaine, after a fleet of thips; they will at length fit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all at adventure. But fay it were otherwife; That the inuading enemie will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Armie of ours readie to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders 20 and Captaines, shall be drawne together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the desence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie

There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthned by art: it being enery where hard of accesse; having no good harbour wherein to shelter a Nauie of friends; and vpon every coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approch of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monstear 1582. 40 de Chattes, that held it to the vic of Don Antonio, with five or fixe thousand men, thought to have kept the Marquelle of Santa Cruz, from feeting foot on ground therin; the Marqueffe having the wed himfelfe in the Roade of Angra, did fet faile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre diffant from thence, where hee wanne a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chattes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strofte, flaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold bloud, had instructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would bee perswaded to 50 mike fuch diligent hafte, from Margat to the Welle, and back againe, it may bee doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe, when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

landed in England.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, Hhhhh

France, or elfewhere, ynlesse it be hindered, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeare 1597. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may bee defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, my selfe, and thereforeought to take notice of this inflance. For whereas I finde an action of minecited, with omission of my name; I may, by a civill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that theenterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voiage, who aduised me not to vidertakeit: 10 and I hearkned vnto them, fomewhat longer than was requifite, especially, whilest they delired me, to referre the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coail, than to inuade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea euen there where I landed, if I would have taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that bulineffe, than of fatetic. For I thought it to belong vnto the honor of our Prince & Nation, that a few Handers should not thinke 20 any aduantage great enough, against a fleet fet forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine owne squadron, whose affistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would have been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driven to turne taile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men affured, Comanders of mine owne squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaties, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke , Sir William Harney , Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot , Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thinne , Sir Charles Morgan , Sir Walter Chute , Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, fuch as well vnder- 30 Hood themselues and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vndertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or fixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketiers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great losse. This I could have done with leffe danger, so that it should not have served for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen about named, though more priuate, than to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of braueric, and 40 take the shorter course; having it still in mine owne power to fall off, when I should thinke it meet. It is callly faid, that the Enemie was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie fuch a fmall peece of feruice, by feeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember, that the same enemic troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his advantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to bee past, when wee had wonne good footing, would needes 50 follow vs to the Towne, were driven by him, to for sake the pace of a man of warre, and betake themselves to an hastie trot.

For end of this digreffion, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Majesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no leffe disdaine, than any Nation under heaven can doe, to be beaten youn their owne ground, or elsewhere, by a forraigne enemie; yet to entertaine those that shall affaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentifs Capons, I take to be the wifest way. To doe which, his Majettie, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment ypon the shore.

How the Romans attempt agains to get the mastrie of the Seas. The victorie of CAE-CILIVS the Roman Consult at Panormus. The siege of Lilybaum. How a Rhodian Gallieentred Lilybaum at pleasure, in despight of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good hips. The Romans, by reason of grienous losses received, under CLAVDIVS and IVNIVS their Confulls, abandon the Seas againe.

Hen, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether imposfible, either to keepe what they had alreadic gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elfewhere, they refolged once againe, notwithstanding their late misaduentures, to strengthen their flect and thips of warre. So cauting fiftie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Confulls, C. Milius, and L. Manlius. On the other lide, of drubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwrack which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leffe daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Confulls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cacilius, with only the other halfe, remained at Pa-30 normus : he remoued with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybaum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cacilius to fight. But the Confull was better aduised. For when Aldrubal had made his approaches somewhat neare the Towne, Cacilius caus d a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground fufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gave order that they should advance themselves, and passe over the new trench, till fuch time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those bealts he commanded them to retire, by flow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinck of the new trench, which they could by no meanes paffe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they 40 were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vtterly disorderedthem. Cacilius, espying this advantage, sallied with all the force he had; and them to their heels, making a great flaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants. The report of this victorie being brought to Rome, the whole flate, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred faile, which they fent into Sicil, to give end to that warre, that had now lasted fourteene yeares. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolue to attempt Lilybeum, the only place of importance which 50 the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) faue Drepanum, that was neare !joyning. They fet downe before it, and possesse themselves of all the places of acuantage neare vnto it, especially of such as comand the hauen, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fix towres of defence; & by forceable engines weaken so many other parts of the citie, as the defendants begin to despaire.

Yet Himileo, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious fallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other pettie Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reucaled by an Achean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, faued significantum. Himiles vieth the helpe of Alexon, to affure the hired Souldiers; and imploieth Hannibal to appeare the troups of the Gaules, which did waver, and had fent their agents to the enemie. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vn-10 able to performe what they had undertaken, are faine to line in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to descrue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal, the sonne of Amilear, for their Conductor: who, in despieht of all refistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible joy of the belieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himileo with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the fiege, or (at least) to take from them, or fet on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermos, with great flaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, 20 and having the advantage of the ground, hold ftill their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilybaum; but know not how to fend into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian undertakes the fernice; and having received his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Agusa, a little Hand neare Lilybeum. Thence, taking histime, he steered directly with the Port; and having a paffing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channell, and recouered the water gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to 30 be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he fet faile, and shipping his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recourred the Hauens mouth, and the Sca, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompaffed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to undertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a-farre-off, the aduenture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the 40 best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no, though fortie pecces of great Artillerie open their mouths against him, and threaten to teare him in preces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at Warre; our East-Land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatned to finke their ships if they came through the streights of Elfenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduenture; and, full ayning some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or sinke them, at their returne. But so the Minien, commanded (as Itake it) by William Burrough less ing the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elfensur; which at that time was not fo well rampared as now purhaps it is : and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long lince, that the Duke of Parma, befieging Antwerp, and finding no pollibilitie to mafter it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Cannon on the banke of the River, fo well to purpofe, and so even with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne vp by any winde of gloric, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme dearein Antwerp, passed in boats of ten or twelue Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of sloud fauoured them; as also with a contrarie 10 winde, and an obbing water, they turned back againe : fo as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the River, to his meruailous trouble and

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeare 1596, when we entred the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaied vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanque, from fixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The fiege of oftend, and of many other places, may be given for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the pasface of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is fo fet, as that of Angrain Tercera, that there is no paffage along be-26 fide it, or that the faips are driven to turne vpon a bow line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in fuch places, is it of great vie, and fearefull:

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian : He arrives in fafetic at Carthage. and makes them know the chate of Lilybeum. Others also, after this, take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great flories, and finke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it against inpart: but they grounded to many of those great-bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest riting and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the paf-30 fage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the brane Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chace, and gathered vpon him; he findes what shee is, both by her forme, and by her swiftnesse; and being not able to runne from her, refolued to fight with her: But shee is too well manned for him, fo that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybaum, after this, is greatly diffressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lalybeum, were 40 ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performes it: for the fire was no fooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became relistlesse, and in the end burned all to alhes, and melted the brasen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they refolue, by a long fiege, to Herue the Defendants.

Vpon relation of what had pail, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Confull. He arrives at Mellana, and marcheth over land to Lilyb.eum: where having re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the furprise of Drepanum, a Citie on the other 50 lide of the Bay of Lilybeum. This feruice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Confull imbarques his troups, and arrives on the fudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new fupply arrived at Lilybaum, was at first amazed at their sudden approch; but having recovered his spirits, he per-Hhhhhh 2 fwades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall hee promifeth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall descrue them; offering to leade them himselse, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Hauing sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Confull, deceiued of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his advantage, and forceth the Confusi into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, having the land on his back; hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streightened, as he could not turne himselfe any way 10 from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of relistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away : all the rest of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indifcretion and flight, as much differed at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threescore Gallies, with which they send away L. Innius, their Consull, 10 take charge of their businesse in Sciol. Innius arriues as CMasselfans, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman sheet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Libbusm. One hundred and 20 twentie Gallies he had; and besides these, he had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which wereladen with all necessarie provisions for the Armie. With this great sheet he arriues at Syrausse, where he states a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of sale, to keepe companie with him along from Messans. In the meane time, he dispatcheth away towards Libbusm, his Questors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their conuoy.

Adherbal was not carelesse, after his late victorie: but studied how to vic it to the best aduantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies he deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten 30 more vnder his owne charge, and sent him to trie, what good might be done against the Roman sleet, in the Hauen of Liybaum. According to this direction, Carthalo studenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he sindes the Roman snore attentiue to the keeping in of the besieged Carthagains, than to the desence of their owne against another seet. So he chargest hem, boords and takes some, and sire the rest. The Roman Campetakes larme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himiles, Gouernour of the Towne, is not behinde hand; who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans in great distresse, gives Carthalo good leisure to goe through with his enterorise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicil, deuising how 40 to worke mischiefe to the enemie: wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was aduertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neare at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessells. These were the vistipaliers, which the Consull lumius, more hastily than providently, had fent before him towards Liphoum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make strong opposition, he hastiens to encounter them. It sell out according to his expectation. The Roman had no minde to sight: but were glad to seek shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder cower of a poore Towne, 50 belonging to their partie; that could helpe to saue them only from the present danger, by lending them engines and other aide, where with to beat off the Carthagier, that saided them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a sew of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride vnder those rocks, but would be forced, by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to faue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loffe of all their lhipping. Whileith ewas builed in this care; the Confull lanius drew neare, and was difcouered. Against him Caribaio makes out, and findes him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Confull had neither meanesto file, nor ablittie to fight. Therefore he likewife ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger log great, as that of the enemie. The Caribaginan, Iceing this, betakes himfelfe to a Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to see which of them would first fittre, with a refolution to affault that, which is flould first dare to put telest into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on

The South coast of Stat, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybeum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carthagnians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding belike some swelling billow (for so we doe in the Weit of England, before a Southerly storme) hasted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themseliues from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to sight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any soule weather in the entrailes of their beasts, their Southayers being all land-prophets, were suddenly ouertaken with a boisterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced againtt the rocks, and vtterly wrackt.

This calamitic fo difcouraged the *Romans*, that they refolued againe to for fake the Sens*, and truft only to the feruice of their Legions woon firme ground. But fitch a refolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or elfe they must not make warre in an Iland, against those that have a mighte seer. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their warn of skill. Here I cannot for beare to commend the patient vertuce of the Spaniarsis. We feldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniarsis have done, in their status Discourses. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an inuincible constancie, they have annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempetts and shipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, petilence, and all manner of discases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, haue beene the enemies, wherewith every one of their most noble Discouerers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many yeares have passed over ome of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, have spent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift undertakers, have not been edishearthed. Surgley, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they en-in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

). XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recoursed by AMILCAR; Who stoutly holds warre with them fine yeares. The Romans having emptied their common treasurie, build a new fleet, at the charges of private men. The great victorie at Sea of Lvc TATIVS the Confull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

He Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of itrength at Sea. Therefore they continue the fiege of Lilyb.eum, and fecke to make fure to themselues all places, whither the tybeam, and tecke to make ture to themselves an places, whittier the enemies thips could not bring reliefe. The Confull tunius, to cure the wound of difhonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprise to vidertake. In the end he resolued to attempt the Mountayne and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the lland; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Erys was commodiously scated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restraine the Carthaginians from making 20 roades into the Countrie. Wherefore Innius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, ( both which places were very detencible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the tenth yeare of this warre, the Carthaginians fent forth Amilear, furnamed Bareas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who failing to the coasts of Itahe, did throughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For he first orall wasted and destroied the Territories of the Lecrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil; and finding there no walled Citic in the Carthaginians power, that ferued fitly to infelt the Romans, he occupied a peece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to 30 confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himfelfe betweene both Armies with admirable refolution.

The place that Amiliar had seized vpon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoure all the coalt of Italie with his fleet, waiting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil heheld the Romans to hard worke : lying neare vnto Panormus, wherein three yeares abode he did many notable acts, though not of much confequence, for that the enemic could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormia, he vndertooke a ftrange peece of worke at Eryn. The Roman Garrifons, placed there by junius, on 40 the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheleffe Amlear found a way, lying towards the Sca-fide, by which he conueighed his men into the Citic of Errx, that was about the middelt of the ascent, eretheenemie knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were streightly held (asit were) besieged. And no lesse was Amiliar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such ascameto relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeares more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrarie did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Caribaginius, was bent 50 vnto the profequating of this bufinesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hanni-Lia.Du.3. Lio. bal, in Line, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, fince the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had veterly for faken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly upon confidence of their land-forces, which they held refittlesse; smilear, with a fmall Armie, had fo well acquited himfelte, to the honour of his Countrie, that by the triall of fine yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not functiour, to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene deuised and done, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastrie of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilear, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The common treasurie was exhausted : and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon private purses. Divers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme; which example wrought fo well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, joyned with some others, and laying their monie together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another: with condition to be repaied, when the warre was finished. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilyheum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Luclatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum: indepouring by all meanes to have forced the Citie. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late loffes which his Predeceffours had received; he was care-full to put himfelfe in order, against their arrivall. Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wife in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of feeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthic than himfelfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking a-30 mong the ancient fort, whose cold temper is auerse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great forelight, confirmed by enery losse received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the moft grieuous oppressions of their subject Provinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall fuch batred, as turned it all to their those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dilhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loft not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counfaile, when, having showed himselfe an vnworthie Captaine, he betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Historics, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preferue the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee descrued of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miferable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard condi-

great loffe. He had ere this beene imploied against the Numidians, and wild Africans, that were more like to Rouers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of tions, that peace which he thenceforth commended. Hanno had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the belt of his qualities) but he had neither beene carefull in trayning his Marriners, to the practing of 50 Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with flout fellowes. Hee thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the relifflesse force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to for sake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had either conceiued a-right, or elle was fent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, sirst of all to faile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and having thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboord some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilear himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the enemie repent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have beene performed. But Catulus vied all possible diligence, to preuent the execution of this designe: not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that seared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilear. Wherefore although the weather get to greatly, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was deferred; 10 yet he rather chose to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to fuffer this convoy to passe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better oportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catalus had performed Hee had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; hee had lightned his Gallies of all vnnecessarie burthen; and hee had taken aboord the choice men of the Roman Land souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were etterly broken and defeated; having fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and funke, and seuentie taken, wherein were few lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieronefu.

The state of Carthage, vtterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to refolue. Meanes to repaire their fleet in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilear, vpon whose valour and judgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now furrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where he could not be relieued. In this extremitie, they make a dispatch vnto Amilear himselfe, and authorize him to take what courfe should seeme best vnto his excellent wisedome; leaving all conclusions to his election and fole counfaile.

Amilear, whom no aduerlitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recoucrie, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or false, that 30 the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolued to make triall, whether his necessitie might be compounded vpon any reasonable termes. He therefore sent to Luctation the Consull an Ouerture of peace: who confidering it well, gathered fo many arguments from the present pouertie of the Roman State, wasted beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly hearkned vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Ile of Sicil. Secondly, that they should neuer vndertake vpon Hieron 40 King of Syracuse, nor inuade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and fend back into Italic, all the Romans, whom they hold prisoners, without ransome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the same to be deliuered within twentie yeares next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not throughly approued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicil, to make persect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former summe; and requi- 50 red a shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthagmians should not only depart out of Sicil it selfe, but should also with draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betweene it and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick Warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeares without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or thinwrack, about feuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about five hundred : the greatnesse of which losses, doth serue to proue the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the braver Nation: and Amilear, the most worthing Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of divers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

Of the cruell warre begunne betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercinaries.

HE Romans, having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Ilands thereunto adjacent, gaue them rather meanes and leifure to helpe themselues in a following warre, than cause to hold themselues contented with the present peace. It is a true rule, Quod leges @ curt.la. à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are given by the Conquerers, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Prinernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this waightic businesse. For when one of Privernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator; What peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in 40 these wordes. Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you give vs, it will be perpetuall; if it beill, then of little continuance. To this answere, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was faid, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; an credi poffe, villum populum, aut hominem deniá, in ea conditione, cuius eum paniteat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could beleeve, that any people, or indeede any one man, would continue longer in an ouer-burdened estate, than meere necessitie didenforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this judgement, of those Nations, who had little elfe, befides their manly refolution, to defend their libertie; furely, they grofly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, 50 who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour vnto themselves, would fit downe any longer by the loffe and dishonour received than vntill they could recouer their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only prinate men, but Kings and publique States, have more prenailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue; with held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most scarefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punick Warre was ended; Amilear, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybeum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might bee transported into Africk : the care of which butinesse he committed vnto Gesca, to whom, as to a man of approued sufficiencie, he deliuered ouer his charge. Gefco had an especiall consideration of the great fummes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercinaries; and, withall, of the great disabilitie to make paiment. Therefore he thought it the wifelt way, to fend them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that To the first might have their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Com- 10 paniesarriued. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not beene hard to per-Iwade any small number, lodged within so great a Citic as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinelle of the common Treasurie did require : so that the first might have beene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whileft their disjunction had made them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique state, by remitting a great part of their ownedue; and box by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and can tion. So they detayned the first and second commers, telling them, that they 20 would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increafed, and many disorders (athing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regardit was thought fit, to remoue them all to some other place where they might be leffe troublesome. This must be done by some colourable wordes of perswasion : for their number was alreadie fo great, that it was not fafe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sieca: receiving enery one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wines, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly 30 to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to truffe vp their fardells, that they might have none occasion left, to make any errands this ther. So to Siccathey remoued, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Bulineffe they had none to doe, and therfore might easily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their monie came in; how much would fall to enery single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticisms; and he was thought a man of worth, that could 40 finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable wordes and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time paffeth away; sutilithe whole Armie being arrived, and lodged in Sica, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be maderich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause: So thinke they all; and affemble themselues to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to helpe his 50 memoric in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made whother when the sum of the charges, whereat the common-wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally defires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out or the love which they bare vnto the citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his difcourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of fundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceived the whole tenour of his speach, had informed the rest what cold comfort hee brought; they were all inraged, and fared like mad men, fo that nothing would ferue to appeale them. Hanns would faine have affwaged their furie, but he knew not how: for hee leffe vnderstood their dissonant lowde noises, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither eafily ftirred up to mutinic, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage, The best that Hanno can doe, is to vie the helpe of Interpreters, and meifengers. But thefe Interpreters miltake his meaning; lome, for want of fkill; others, of fet purpose; and fuch as deliuer his errandes in the worst sense, are best beleeved. Finally, they thinke them felues much abused, by the Carthaginians, and resolute to demaund their owne, in peremptorie termes, at a nearer diffance. In this moode they leaue Sieas, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they 20 incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne errour. It is a good rule,

Curandum inprimis, ne magna iniuria fiat Fortibus & miferis :

Haue special care, that valiant pouertie Be not opprest with too great inturie.

But this proude citie, having neglected the rule, hath also beene carelesse in provi-20 ding to fecure her felfe against the inconvenience that might followe. She had fuftered the whole multitude, whereunto shee was like to give cause of discontent, to joyne it felfe into one bodie, when the feuerall troupes might easily have beene dispersed: shee hath turned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of these pooremen, which had thee retained in thewe of kindnette, thee might have yied them, as Hotlages, for her owne fafetie; and by imploying a miferable pennie father, in her negotiation with men of warre, thee bath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue served to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilear had no defire to be viedas an infirument indefrauding his owne fouldiours of their wages: especially considering, that as he to beficould beare witnesse of their merits, so was hee not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereto may be added a probable conjecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilear, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counfaile, vpon the liberall promifes made by the Captaines Amilear therefore did wifely, in suffering those that maligned him, to have the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had ihuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begunne. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the fouldiours; whom they suffer to buy what they lift, and at what price they lift. They fend euer and anone fome of their Senatour's 50 into the Campe; who promife to fatisfic all demands, as farre foorth as it should be polible. And thus, by thifting from one extreame to another, they make the fouldiours understand, into what feare the city was driven; which cannot but adde much infolencie to the passions alreadie stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the

CHAP.2. S.I.

Armie, which thereupon growes wife, and finding the feafon fit, labours to make a great baruett. Monie must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have loft their horfes, in publique service of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had lived some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiving their silowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ferue. They faid that they had beene fometimes driven to buy; and that (fince they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the 10 dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might casily have beene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make none end of crauing. For whilest the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this corne-monie; the Souldiers have denifed many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater fumme of monic, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of these controuersies, which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, thould be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choice of Gesco : partly out of good liking to him, who had 20 thewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, espacially when they were to be transported into Africk: partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilear; for that hee had not visited them in all this busie time. So Ge/co comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without monie: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calles vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then, the feuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; aduising them temperately concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their love vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaies be mindfull of their good feruices. After this he beganne to put 30 hand to his purse: offering to give them their whole paie in hand; and then after to confider of other reckonings, at a more convenient time. This had beene well accepted, and might have ferued to bring all to a quiet paffe; if two feditious ringleaders of the multitude had not flood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a flurdie fellowe, and audacious, but a flaue; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whome hee ferned, and therefore flood in feare, left hee should be delinered backe to his Master; at whose hands hee could expect no leffe, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raifing such troubles, as might ferue to withdrawe men from care of private matters, and make his owne resti- 40 tution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there affociated himselfe one Matho; an hote-headed man, that had beene so forward in stirring vp the tumult, as hee could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should bee made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behauiour. This Matho deales with his countrimen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worfe condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spawiards, or any forreyne mercinaries. For (laith he) thefe our companions have no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and fo get them gone : but wee, that are to flay behinde in Africa. Shall bee called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; so that wee shall have cause to wish, that wee had returned home beggars, rather than loaden with 50 the monie, which (little though it be) shall breake our backes. Tee are not ignorant how tyrannically thefe our haughtie Masters of CARTHAGE decreione over us. They thinke it reasonable, that our lives and goods should bee at their disposition; which they have at other times beene accustomed to take away from vs, even without apparent cause, as it were to

deel we their Sourceigntie: what will they now doe, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as free men, and beene bold to fet a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others have done? Ye all doe knowe, that it were a very shame for vs, if having beene as forward in euerie danger of warre, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaves, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithfranding yee may affure your felues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as foone as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let us therefore be wife; and confider, that they hate and feare us. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past : unlesse wee now take 10 our time, and, whilst we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatlie, that their hatred shall not be able to doe vs wrong. All their flrength confileth in monic, wherewithall they have hired others against vs , and vs against others. At the present they have neither monie nor friends. The best Armie that ever served them , whereof wee are no small part, lies at their gates, readie to helpe visif we be men. Abetter opportunitie cannot be expected : for were our fwords once drawne, all AFRICK would rife on our fide. As for the CARTHAGI-NIANS, whether can they fend for helpe? The offeit felfe is plaine : but we must quickely resolue. Either we must preuent the diligence of GESCO, by inconsing these GAVLES and SPANIARDES, and procuring them to draw blood; or elfeit behoueth us to please our good masters, by toyning with them against our fellowes, year by offering to forgive vnto 20 them all our wages, if fo (peraduenture) they may be ewonne to forgive us, or not overcruelly to punish our faults alreadie committed. He is worthily a wretched flane, that neither halbeare to winne his Masters love, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By fuch perfivations Matho winners the African Guidiers to his owne purpofe. They are not now to greedie of monie, as of quarrell; which hee that feekes will not milife to finde. When 6% therefore offered to pay them their whole flipend prefently, but referred their other demandes, for horfesand victualles, to fome other more convenient time; they breake into great outrage, and fay that they will have all, evenall at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho and Spendius; whole diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuell to the fire alreadie blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onelic men to whom the fouldiours will hearken: if any other fland up to make a speach, a flower of slones, shying about his cares, puts him to silence, that hee shall neuer afterwards speake word more. Neither flay they to consider what it is that any man would fay; enough hath beene saide alreadie by these good spokesmen, so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be cheard, saue onely throw, throve.

Now the Rebellion beginnes to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no manto make his owne peace, but purfue their owne ends, under faire pretence of the com-40 mon cause. All which not withstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentures himfelte vpon their furie. One while hee deales with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and gining gentle wordes; another while he workes with the feuerall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts defire, if any reason would content them. None of them are fofullen, as the Africans: indeed none of them had fo good cause. They require him peremptorilie, to give them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couctous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answere, than of a good paiment. This is more then Gefco knowes: he sees not that Matho hath any more than bare words, to bellow vpon them. Wherefore, as 50 tebuking their inconfiderate heat, he telles them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Captaine, Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure that he had brought; yeavpon him also, and althat are with him: Iiiii 2

as intending to take this in part of paiment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleafed them to feetheir fellowes beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that so the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this followes open warre. Matho follicites all Africk; and his Embaffadours are euerie where well entertained. Neither is it needefull to vie perswasion: the verie same of this rebellion sufficeth to drawe the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians bee plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversitie hath neuer beene vntold of her errours: and as she is ever affin- 10 red to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne shee vndergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impolitions were mercileffe; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their corne, that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted vpon their vaffals the greatest punishments for the least offences. These cruclties the Carthaginians themselues have forgotten: but the people, that have fuffered fo much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely fuch as can beare armes, are readie to doe feruice in this great Commotion; but the verie women bring forth their iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to fale for maintetenance of foiust a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, 20 Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threescore and tenne thoufund Africans: and are moreouer furnished with monie, not onely to fatisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begunne. though it should bee of long endurance.

Diverse observations upon this warre with the mercinaries.

†. I

Of Tyrannie, and how tyrants are driven to whe helpe of mercinaries.

Ere let vs reft awhile, as in a conucnient breathing place: whence we are may take prospect of the subicet, ouer which we trauaile. Behold a go warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessaries with a deadlie warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessaries, that a tyrannic should be evpheld by mercinatic forces: it is common that mercinatics should be false: and it is common, that all warre, made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hateand crueltie. Yet wee seldome heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannic is procured or sought, by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or neuerdoe we reade of any warre, that hath beene prosecuted with such inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which wee properly call Tyrannie, is Aviolent forme of gonernment, not respecting the good of the subtest, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely so forbeare to say, that it is the vniust rule of one ouer many: for verie truely doth Cleon in Thurydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their subjects, was none other than a meere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselues were

were a great Citie, and a Popular effate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and eafily bee conceiued, that no man willingly performes obedience, to one regardlesse of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practife of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for lome Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very flaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheleffe, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto noto tice of the difference which might bee found betweene the worth of feuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, bath fo good a rellith, as continually inflames the T yrants appetite, and will not fuffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee seeke out bounds, to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should have riches in goodly abundance. He harh taken a great deale from enery one; but enery one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, and now hee hath enough: but (as Couctoulnesse is never fatisfied) he thinkes that all this is too little for a flock, though 20 it were indeede a good yearlie Income. Therefore he denifeth new tricks of robberie, and is not better pleased with the gaines, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this; and he knowes it well: but hee thinkes by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspeeteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to deale crastily; but if Innocencie be not fafe, how can all this make any Conspiratour to stand in feare, fince the Traitor is no worferewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee canthinke vpon none other fecuritie, than to difarme all his Subjects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustic Souldiers as shall bee thought sufficient. These must not bee of his 30 owne Countrie: for if not every one, yet some one or other, might chance to have a feeling of the publique miferie. This confidered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vnhonest that can bee found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose only fauour they are maintayned. Now left any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth give, should bee drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe; they shall all be permitted to doe as hee doth; to robbe, to rauish, to murder, and to fatisfie their owne appetites, in most outragious manner; being thought so much the more affured to their Master, by how much the more he sees 40 themgrow hatefull to all men elfe. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write: I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some Englift-man perhaps, that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this leafe, might suppose this discourse to be little better. This is to show, both how tyrannie growes to stand in neede of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercinaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmely assured vnto the Tyrant.

†. II.

t. I I.

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subjects is worfe, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise wse mercinarie Souldiers.

Now concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subjects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life : the leffe neede hath shee therefore, to se- 10 cure her selfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needes the leffe, to pluck from her Subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion, driue her to necessitie, of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie fummes of monie: the same necessitie makes either the contribution casic, or the taking excusable. Indeede, no wrongs are so grieuous and hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And lunenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her flaues; that whileft thee was whipping them, shee painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of 20 neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest gricuances, wherwich a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all fense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although defire of libertie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throts, and maintaine them in all villagie. as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrific, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselues, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to descrue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this not with standing, it shall appeare, That the miseries, where with a Ty-30 rant lodeth his people, are not so heavie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some apparance of truth, it may bee said, that Lust, and many other prinate passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall have neede to vie the helpe of fuch distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascinious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his gravitic, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By comon practise, and generall approued custome, we are to censure the qualitie of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice, of any one man; nor by metaphyficall abstraction, of the universall from the fingular; 40 or of the Corporation, from these of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I have faid elsewhere) That it were better to line vnder one pernicious Tyrant, than vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe : but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate socuer, if they cannot be fatisfied, yet they may be wearied; hee is not able to fearch all corners; his humour may be found, and foothed; age, or good advice, yea, or fome vnexpected accident, may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his Successout may proue better. Many Tyrants haue beene changed into worthic Kings and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditarieto their posteritie, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Gouernement, euen 50 a lawfull Monarchie. But they that live vnder a tyrannicall Citie, have no fuch hope: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they bee pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receive the bridle of a more mightic Chariotier. This is wofull : yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull of the future. New flies, and hungrie ones, fall vpon the fame fore, out of which, others had alreadic fucked their fill. A new Gouernour comes yearly among them, artended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home emptic to their hines, without a good lading of waxe and honie. These sie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with enery mans wealth, or whatfoeuer elfe, in all the Province, is worthie to be defired. They know all a mansenemies, and all his feares: becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he fearethmost. To grow into acquaintance with these matterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vnder-gone) and such as eto pery one hath not meanes to goe about : but were this effected, what availeth it? The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successiour of this man, he is more louing than could be wished, in respect of a faire Wise or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemie to both his fore goers, who feekes the ruine of all that have beene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyrannie are not simple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recoverie, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it served not wholly to restraine their Prouinciall Gouernours; who prefuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Proninces, to 20 worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groned under such oppressions; what mult we thinke of those, that were vasfalls vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthen some tributes: they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for having beene ill Gouernours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly deuised by one Magistrate, serued as presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable statesman, whose robberies had beene fuch, as might affoord a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practife, are not extant : the government of Verres the Roman, nour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in scare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By profequating this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Propolition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subject Provinces so mildly, as a King:

but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyrannic of a Citie is farre more intole-

20 in Sicil, that is lively fet out by Tullic, may ferue to informe vs, what was the demea-rable, than that of any one most wicked man. Suteable to the crueltie of fuch Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and againe, futeable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it sollowed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vie the service of African souldiers; in Africk it felfe, they had rather bee beholding to others, that were farther 40 fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick Warre, shift his mercinaries out of their owne Countries; VI Afriin Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melier Liu, Dec. 3. Liv. procul ab dome futurus vterą, miles, velut mutus pignoribus obligati fipendia tacerent; That the Africans might ferue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them ike to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obiged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African, and Spanish birelings, could properly be termed Mercinaries: for they were subject vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet feeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere defire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely fland vpon proprietic of a word, but 50 hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercinaries.

t. III.

The dangers growing from the Use of mercinarie Souldiers, and forraigne Auxiliaries,

The extreme danger, growing from the imploiment of fuch Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, denourers, and destroiers of all places and countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commo- 10 ditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremitie, not only refused to fight, in their detence, who have entertained them, but revolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that have trusted them. These Mercinaries (faith Machiauel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of Erancedid paffe: the Alpes, were the cause that the faid French King wonne the Realme of Naples. with his Buckler without a fword. Notable was the example of sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Joane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first 20 of that race Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his flaues, even with the same Armie which themselves had levied for their owne defence. But Lodouick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole estate by the trecherie of such faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had beene. For, having waged an Armic of Switzers, and committed his Duchie, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them delinered vp vnto his enemie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in vling the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We 30 fee, that when the Emperor of conflantinople had hired ten thou and Turkes, against his neighbour Princes, he could neuer, either by persualion or force, set them againe ouer Sea vpon Asia side: which gave beginning to the Christian servicus, that soone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, such the same Alexander who had invited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syraean the Turke was called into Agypt, that Saladian his Succession but this Turke did settle himselfe so furely in Agypt, that Saladian his Succession became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What neede we looke about for examples of this kinde? Eurry Kingdome, in effect, can furnss hy the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be alleaged, the good successe of the vnited Prouinces of the Netherland's, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed these Low Countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Seamen, and therein is their excellencies, neither are they bad, at the desence of a place well fortissed: but in open field they have seldome beene able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessities therefore compelled them to seek helpe abroad: and the like 50 necessities made them for beare to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raised by their Trade, they maintay ned the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they speed well. Surely they speed as ill as might be, whilest they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witnesse it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassau, telt it to his griefe, in his retrait from Groeninghen; when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercinaries cried out aloud for monie, and for anne away. This was not the only time, when the hired souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize under a shew ofgreedinesse; or at least, by meere concrousnesse, have ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples : for they themselves will not denicit. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur to the Duke of Anion, brother to the French King; faue that it is follie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that fuch Aiders make themselues Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with fuch another as this Monfieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrie, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, hee lined to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whilest he was counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginaric forrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to bee surprised and wonne; the death of the Count 20 St. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citic, discharged against his owner roupes, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in neede of pittie. Then was his fained passion changed, into a very bitter anguilh of minde; wherein, finiting his breaft, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not ferue to proue, that there is litle danger in vling mercinarie fouldiers, or the helpe of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithillanding they were obedient vnto necessitie, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wifely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen 20 of England refused to accept the Soueraigntie of their Countrie, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemie, purfued him with continuall warre; when the heire of England raigned in Scotland, a King too just and wife (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miferies, or to helpe those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance : then might the Netherlanders very fafely repose confidence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The fouldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receive; but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand; or if any were cold in his deuotion, to the fide whereon he fought; yet was he kept in order, 40 by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if his faith had beene corrupted by the Spannard. They were therefore trusted with the custodic of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitic of the poorer fort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three fuch Princes, raigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Countric, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure ofher Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other bulineffe in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may 50 well hold true in generall. That mercinarie, and forraigne auxiliarie forces, are no leff dangerous, than the enemie, against whom they are entertained.

t. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gavethem affurance to vee the service of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vee and benefit of the like moderation.

Here may it be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse feruice of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subjects; how 19 happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoide the inconueniences aboue rehearfed? The answere is; That their Armies were compounded viuallie of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equal number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Sammites, or other of their subjects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldome they did implie so many,) tenne Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting : which serue to keepe in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the Armie than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priviledges and immunities, which they en. 20 ioved, made them affured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they lived almost at libertie, as being bound to little elfe, than to ferue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke. how easie soeuer, seemes trouble some to the necke that hath been accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of seuerall aduantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have beene reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion have sharpely punished; and the people, by degrees, have obtained fuch libertic, as made them effecme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in processe of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off remooued, even to Tarfus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne. That all the Burgesses should bee free of Rome it selfe. 30 This fauour was conferred absolutlie vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wontto pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readic way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition, when the reuiew of harder times past, should rather teach them to fearear clapfe, than to hope for better in the future, by feeking innouation Neither would it be forgotten, as a special note of the Romans good gouernment, That when some, for their well-descruing, have had the offer to be made citizens of Rome; they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with 49 their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Petellia, a citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, youn any condition, to for fake the Romans; euen when the Romans them felues had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their ownegood, as having beene faithfull to the vtmost. Such love purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adjoyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vse of sourcigne power being so effectuall, in assuring the people vnto their Lords, and consequentie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion : it may feeme strange, that the practife of tyrannie, whose checks are contrarie, hath beene so common in all ages. The like, I knowe, may bee saide, of all Vice, and irregularitie what socuer. For it is leffe difficult (who socuer thinke otherwise) and more fafe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it; vet commonly our passions lead vs into by-pathes. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, orany the like Affection, feduceth our reason; the same vnrulie appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least-wife taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannic it is not for for as much as we can hardly describe passion, that is of force to infinuate it felfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It must be confessed, that lawleffe defires have bred many Tyrants: yet fo, that thefe defires have feldome beene hereditarie, or long-latting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants

10 life, fometimes before his death; by which meanes the Gouernment hath beene reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyran-Arist, Pollibs, nies are of fort continuance. But this doth not fatisfie the question in hand. Why did 6.12. the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie ? why did the Athenians ? why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they beignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherin so many thoufand citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concurre, notwithstanding the much diversitie of temper, and the vehemencie of prinate hatred among them? Doubtles, we must be faine to say, That T yrannie is, by 20 it felfe, a Vice diffinet from others. A Man, we knowe, is Animal politicum, apt, even by Nature, to command, or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other delires of Mankinde, are common likewife vnto bruit beaftes; and fome of them, to bodies wanting fense; but the defire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reafon; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the fustentation of their life : as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewife naturall, in convenient measure, both vnto mankinde, and to all creatures that have fense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite : euen so is this defire of ruling or obaying, engratted by 30 Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuile forme of iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vsefull. Neuerthelesse, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonic and Drunkenneise, which, in reproach, are called beastlie, by an unproper terme : since they grow from appetites, found in leffe worthie creatures than beaftes, and are yet not lo common in beaftes, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of fuch other Poffions as descend no lower than vnto bruit beastes, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more gricuously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is belt; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice 40 more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which iffueth from the most noble roote, even the deprayed Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefes, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether bee the worse; That all thin, s, or That nothing, thould be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie diffemper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to fublift: yet the defective dulnesse that permitteth any thing wil also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more active, and pleafeth it felfe in the excesse, with with a false colour of iu-

50 flice. Examples of Pupiditic, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though fuch natures are enery where found; for this qualitie troubles not it felfe in feeking Empire; or if by some errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding him felfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) fome friend or else a wife, is it not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowen, is without a name. T yrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowen, but would be reputed honours ble : for it is prosperum & falix scelus , a fortunate mischeif , as long as it can ful fine There is no reward or honour (faith PETER CHARRON) assigned to those, that knowe how to incresse, or to preferue humane nature: all honours, greatneffe, riches, dignities. empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for those, that knowe how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. CAES AR, and ALEXANDER, have vn-made and flaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the errour of Mans judgement, in valuing things according to common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripeneffe, is none other, than 10 Feritie: the same that Aristotle faith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, iffuing from the Passions incident both to Man, and Beast; no lesse than Periurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceede in villanie. the faults of Cluttonie and drunkennelle, that grow from more ignoble appetites, Hereof Seiron, Procruftes, and Pity ocamptes, that yied their bodily force to the dethruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Lionyfius and Agathodes, whose mischeinous heades were affished by the hands of detestable Russians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Failie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference betweene Freemen, and flaues.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himfelfe, so that it is alwates, and simplie, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Realon ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can have ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Fatherouer his whole countries which hee that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to bee, knows to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God gaue unto Adams, when he said, slave dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the

Generit views gaue vnto Adam, when he faid; thank dominion outer the fifth of the Sea, and out the fowle of the aire, and outer entries thing that moueth upon the earth: which also hee confirmed vnto Nosh, and his children, laying, The search you, and the dread of you, 30 flux be upon eneric beafing the earth, and upon currief owle of the aire, upon all that moneth upon the earth, and upon all the tifles of the Sea; into your hards are they delinered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue alloan apritude to whic. It. The execution of this power hath fince extended it felfe, ouer a great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no finall numbers of men, whose disabilities to gouerne themselves, proues them, according who Anylandes doctrine, to be naturallie flaues.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfulnesse the terror be sufficientlie intimated, where it is said, That a man ewe not 'or it, hui if thou mult be made free, wfeit rather. It is true, that Christian religion both procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Mafters shood in feare, of being discovered by their slaues, vnto the perfecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drewe many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbad it, as vnlawfull, vnto his fectatours, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; faue that by the practife of the Turks and Moores, it feemes he did not. In England we had many bond-feruants, wittill the times of our latic time warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning prillenage are ftill in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaues were made free, which were of great vse and service, there are growney parabble of Rogues, Cutpurses, and other the like Trades; slaues in Nature, though not in Lawe.

But whether this kind of dominion belawfull, or not; Ariflotle hath well proued, that it is naturall. And certainely we finde not such a latitude of difference, inany creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in chate, of the clect & reprobate) the wifelt excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpasse the wifest of beaits. Therfore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason; we shall find, that Nature is the ground cuen of Masterly power, and of seruile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly faid, that fome countries have sublisted long, without the vse of any scruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries have not the vse of any tame cattaile. Indeede the affections which vphold civile rule, are (though more noble) not fo simplie needfull, vnto the sustentation either of our kinde, as are Lust, and the 20 like; or of cuerie one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowell in degree. But where most vile, and seruile dispositions, have libertie to show themselves begging in the streetes; there may wee more justly wonder, how the dangerous toile of fea-faring men can finde enough to vindertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by accesse of those, that are wearie of their owne more painefull condition. This may fuffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted even by Nature, a defire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleafure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being fo, we finde no cause to meruaile, how Tyrannie hath beene so rife 20 in all ages, and practifed, not onely in the finglerule of fome vicious Prince, but cuer by consent of whole Cities and Estates : since, other vices have likewise gotten head, and borne a generall fway; notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have vsed well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not bee dilordered? In the government of wife and children, some are vtterlie carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull conniuencie: others, by masterlierigour, hold their owne blood under condition of flauerie. To be agood Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publicke aboue all respects what soener, is the Vertue infly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages affoord not many exam-40 ples. Hector is named by Aristotle, as one of them; and descruedlie, if this praise be due to extraordinarie heighth of fortitude, vsed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we confider, that a lone of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodnesse: wee shall finde, that no Morall vertue. how great focuer, can, by it selfe, deserve the comemndation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof. fuch, as Dauid, Iolaphat, and Iolias were. Of Christian Kings if there were many fuch, the world would foone be happic. It is not my purpofe to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But hethat can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement 50 either of aduer litie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the general peace and quiet; who not onely vieth his authoritie, but addes the travaile of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to doe instice; by the vigorous influence of whose Gouernment, civilitie is infused, even into those places, that had beene the dennes of fauage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite abolished a flauish Brehen Kkkkk

Law, by which an whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one. whose higher vertue and wisedome doth make the prayse, not onelie of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wives, and the goods. of those that are under his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare leffe regardable: he, I say, that can finde tuch a King, findeth an example, worthie to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerlie wanting. Vnder fuch a King, it is likelie by Gods bleffing, that a land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknowen; that Civilitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subsects, shall cause the Nations farre to offremoued, to with him their Souereigne. I neede not adde hereunto, that all the actions of fuch a King, euen his bodilie exercises, doe partake of vertue: fince all things tending to the preferuation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnspeakeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Least any man should thinke meetransported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason; I adde hereunto, that such a King is neuerthelesse a man must die, and may erre: yet wisedome and fame shall set him tree, from errour, and from death, both 20 with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a lingular benefite (though there be many other belides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruite of his goodnesse. The people that live under a pleasant yoke, are not onclie louing to their Souereigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, than of flout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrarie, he that rulethas ouer flaues, shall be attended, in time of necessitie, by flauish mindes, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may bee furious, and flaues outragious, for a time: but among spirits that have once yeelded vnto flauerie, vniuerfailie it is found true, that Homer faith, God bereaueth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when he cafteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonablic haue spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so livelie an example, of the calamitie following a tyrannicall rule, and the vse of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it felfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barelie deliucred, as out of a common place.

ð. III.

How the warre against the Mercinarie was dinersic mannaged by HANNO and AMILCAR, with variable successe. The bloodie counsailes of the Mercinaries; and their finall destruction.

Eing now to returne vnto those Mercinaries, from whome I have thus farre digreffed, I cannot readilie finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginan; neither care they to pretend, that they fecke their wages alreadie due so that they are neither Mercinaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all beene subjects vnto Carthage, then might they justly have beene termed Rebels: 50 but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegeance to that State, which they endeuoured to subuert. Wherefore I will borrowethe name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercinaries, as Polybius also doth.

They are hardly prest on ia; and by the 10 all fides; and therefore travailed their braines to the vttermost, how to thake off felues, Girel these furious dogges from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes aucha, Niger by day, came vnto the very walles of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made faith, that the their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good pre-issuines; and paration: but had gotten together whatfocuer was needefull, as well to relieue a the Hare, Towns belieged, as to batter and affaile any place defended against him. With and any these prouisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Fisca; so suddenlie called Magathat the enemies, as men surprised, for sooke their Trenches, and retired them selves were ancients unto a rifing peece of woody ground, where they might be fafe against the violence and builtieof his beafts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome first that is to was, after any losse, to flict two or three whole daies journie off; presently entred the in-special parameter.

But thefe good fellowes, against being aringe whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilear, to retire and to fight againe, many was fet very times in one day, as neede required. Therefore as foone as they perceived, that he canbege was knewe not how to vie a victorie; they affailed their owne Campe, and with great thrown down flaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it; forcing them to hide themselves with in the thank the in Vica; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe w & Warre. Faof the Towne. This bad beginning Hanne followed with sureable indiscretion: mous it was by loofing the benefite of many faire opportunities, and fuffering the enemies to take cato the youpossession, of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The Carthaginians, perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did there- victor, that forelet fall their thete anchor; fending to the field their great Captaine, Amilear, worthy Divine whom they furnished with ten thousand foote of supply, and seuentie Elephants, thereof, in the Amilear had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the ene-time of Gentemievpon equal ground. For besides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries who lived a!! had occupied, Hanno had fuffered them to winne the onely Bridge, by which the the time of River Macar, or Bagradas, was paffable vnto those, that were to travaile into the that Tyrant, Continent. This River had not many foords, nor those easie for a single man to get and hath writouer: but vpon them all was kept fuch guard, as gaue to Amilear little hope of pre- of his civeluailing in feeking way by force. But Amilian had observed, that the very mouth of Bigradas y fed to be fometimes cloyed with fund and grauell, that was driven in by certaine customarie windes, and could not be driven out againe, by force of that flow River, till the wind falling, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vie; and taking his opportunitie, passed the River; contrarie to all expectation, either of the enemie, or of his owne

There was no neede to bid spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilear was come over Bagradus: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the 30 newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improvident gravitie of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their owne Master in the Art of Warre; whomethey admired, though they hated him. But this feare was foone changed into prefumption; when more than fifteene thou fand of their owne focietie, were come from Vica; and other tenne thouland from the gard of the Bridge. Their Kkkkk 2

Armie was farregreater, than that of Amilear; and they were, in their owne judgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they resoluted to charge him on all fides, and beate him downe, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this refolution they attended vpon him; watching for some advantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onfet. Especiallie they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptneffe was fuch, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilear held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the seruice of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armic. Neither made hee shewe of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increase, 10 till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neare, as would bee little for their good, if hee should turne vpon them, he hastened his march, even to such a pace, as made a thewe little differing from plaine flight. The Mercinaries presentlie fell vpon his skirts; beleeuing, that for feare of them he was readie to runne away-But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victorie, were driving at the heeles of those that had the Rearc; Amilear wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, fo that amazed with the apprehension of inexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were fix thousand of the Mercinaries slaine, and about two 20 thousand taken; the rest sled some to the Campe at Vices; others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilear followed them fo fast, that he wanne the place eafily: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilear in pursuing it, caused many Townes revolted, partly by seare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numdia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recoucrie of their freedome; hee perfwaded Spendius, and Autaritus that was Captaine of the Gaules, to wait upon Amil- 20 ear, and alwaies to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and hee himselfe continued to pressethe Towns of Hippagreta with an hard fiege. It was necessarie for Amilear, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such waies as there were: for all the countrie lay not levell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground : the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, furrounded with hilles, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie; the same of Amilear his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naranafus, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion serving to get the acquaintance & 40 loue of so braue a man, which he much defired : and therefore came vnto Amilear, fignifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all fernice. Amilest joyfully entertained this friend; promifed vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naranasus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe hee gaue battaile vnto Spendius. wherein the Numidian laboured to approuch is owne valour, to his new friend. So the victorie was great: for there were flaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Autaritus the Gaule, escaped to doe more mischiese. Amilear dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vinwilling to become 50 his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatning to take sharpe reuenge vponall, that should breake this Couerant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autaritus, as tending to winne from them, the hearts of their fouldiers. Wherefore they refolued to take fuch order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilear, nor to hope for any fafetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertifement, wherein was contained, that some of their companie, respective onely of their private benefit, and carclesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betraie them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Gefce, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the fouldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie;

10 and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilear, toward fome, was none other then a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemie Geseo would proone, if hee might cscape their hands. While hee is yet in the midst of his tale; were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autaritus, and speakes his minde plainly: faying, that it were the best, yea the onely way, for the common safetic, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were dividing to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those, that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Gefco his life, than to trouble themselues with looking to his custodie; that by such a course cueric one should be ingaged in the pre-

20 fent Action, as having none other hope left, than in victorie alone; finally, that fuch as would speakehere against, were worthie to bee reputed Traitours. This Autaritus was in great credit with the fouldiours, and could speake fundrie languages, in such fortthat he was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gefa, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheleffe there were some, that for loue of Gefee, fought to alter this intended crueltie; but they were forthwith floned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they herewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be served in like fort: and that the subjects or friends of 30 Carthage, should loofe their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they observed

Of this crueltie I need fay no more, then that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of ving it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Achillornel; All Ifrael fiall heave, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, bestrong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they bee more innocent; and to avoide the punishment of leffe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengefull spirits of those that have beene wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some desiciencie of Lawes, in distinguishing the pu-40 nilhments of malefactors, according to their decree of the feueral crimes. A coward thinkes all prouision too little, for his owne securitie. If PHOCAS be a coward (saide the Emperour MAVRITIVS) then is he murderous. To be stedfast and sure, in taking reuenge; is thought a point of honour, and a defensative against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opolite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie difcouered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise would have repented, and fought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought fo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect even their gentlenesse, as the introduction to extreame rigour. Like vnto the errours of Princes and Gouernours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the same 30 punishment, is awarded vinto the lesse offence, and vinto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconveniences, Mercie and Severitie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilear failed. For as long as these his own fouldiours were any way likely to bee reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanitie

Vntill this time Hanne, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Analear, and done little, as may feeme, for that nothing is remembred of hims, fince his late losses. Neither was Analear foriet owant his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grewe to such extremitie, as threatned vtter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanne sent tor, and came to Analear, with whom hee ioyned his forces. By this access of strength Analear was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: rather he could now performe to nothing; such was the hatred betweene him and his vinworthic Colleague. The Towness of trica and Hippagetas, that had stood alwaises firme on the Carthaginian partie, did now reuost vnto the enemic, murdering all the solutiours that they had in Garrison, and cassing their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouisson stopps to by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were sold in solutions to made a sufficient of the Armie, were sold in solution and Spensius consulted, whist one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vied, as the fafest course, to fend forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practife of those two 20 mightic Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes have often imitated; perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will vie the greater diligence. They have also iouned two chiefe Commanders in equal commission, upon this further confideration; the better to restraine the ambition of any one, that should be trufted with fo great a firength. For hereofall Common-weales have beene iealous, having been etaught by their examples, that have made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point, the Venetians have beene fo circum spect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they have made. It is true, that the equal 30 authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, ferueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them truft:but in mannaging the warre it felfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made neare vnto Rome it felfe, when two good friends were Confuls, or fuch two at leaft, as concurred in one delire of Triumph; which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one yeeres feruice; it is no meruaile, though each of the Confuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end than victorie. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was defired, one Distator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed 49 the manner, to fend forth both the Confuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Province; vnleffe one bulineffe feemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was fo, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their joynt Generals: yet was this neuer or feldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often beene such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equal authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commaunders of one Armie, received great and most daungerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punick warre wee shall finde examples. 50 On the contrarie fide, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they feldome failed to winne exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those tenne Generals, which served the Athenians at the Battaile of Marathon, it may truly be faid, that had not their temper beene better, than the judgment of the people that fent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Militades; their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so hastic, as all came to nought that they undertooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale most remarkeable service. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of turie than of judgement, and so the contrarie, by which the best occasions are as often ouerslipt, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably to undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was flaine after the Battaile of Iarnae, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the faid Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselues, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their assaires. For so much did the valour of the one, outreach the adusednesse of the other, as whatfoeuer the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to loofe, by beeing ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this prefent business who, though they were fill licke of their ill grounded loue to Hanne, and were vnou willing to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armic that served under them. The judgement of the Armic was, that Hanne should depart the Campe; which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilian; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Mathe and Spendius had brought their Armie neare vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a singe. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much, hauing in their Campe aboue fittie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuerthelesse, the Citie was too strong for them to winne by assault: and the entrance 30 of victuailes they could not hinder, if any should bee sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracufe, though during the warres in Sicil he affifted the Romans, and fill continued in their Alliance, yet now fent fuccours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and confequently his owne; because if no other State gaue he Romans: 6 omewhat to trouble their difgestion, the Principalitie of Syracufe would foone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender affistance, and for the present refused good offers made unto them by the Mercinaries. This they did, to shew a kinde of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequele manifestly proued, Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citic, Amilear was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their sipply: so that finding the miclues more straightly beferged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue in the field: where Spendius, and one Zareas an African Captaine assisting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilear worke; scauing Mathoin Tamis, to negociate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naraussus, made Spendius scarefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of watre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the 50 straightst passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might show it selse, with little diaduantage. But Amilear had more skill in this Art, than could bee matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemie to many skirmifles; in all which the fuccesse was such, as added courage to his ownemen, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and someti, aes giving them the overthrowin plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough, to perceive their owne disaduantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomach to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilear prudently foreseeing, that necessitic might teach them to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miferably for succour, that came not: and having spent all their victuailes, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they fuffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deferued any fauour from Cartha- 10 ge; and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driven to fuch extremitie, that they were faine to denoure their owne companions, and yet faw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obftinacie was broken; and they threatned their Captaines with what they had deferued, vnleffe they would goe foorth to Amilear, and feeke fuch peace as might begotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autaritius, fell to consultation, wherein it was refolued, to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselues, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than to perish by the hands of their owne companions. Hereupon they fend to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilear in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet 20 by the conditions which Amilear granted, it feemes that they tooke the blame vpon themseliues, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be difmissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilear told these Ringleaders, that he choose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest hee forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armicin order. The Rebeis, who knew not that peace was concluded upon so gentle articles, thought themselves betraied: and therefore amazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them, and the same 30 aftonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilear both colour of inflice, in accomplishing reuenge, and case in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more,

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilear, with his Narusties and Hambad, carried the warre from Townet o Towne, and found all places readie to yeelde: Vica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, you feare of deferued vengeance; and Tunes, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of 40 the enemic. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendium, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the walles; to terrifie those of his olde companions, that were full in armes. With this rigour the feige began; as if speedie victoric had been assured. Itamibal quartered on that part of Tunis which lay towards Carlhage; Amilear on the opposite side: too farreafunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circums fieed.

Matho from the walles beheld his owne definite, in the miferie of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwife, than by a caft at dice with fortune. So he brake out you that part of the Carthoginian Armic, that lay fecure, as if all 50 danger were paft, under the command of Hannibal: and with fo great and wise pefted furic he falled, that after an exceeding flaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthagian prisoners, he prefently reunged the death of Spendius by the fame torture. Of this Annibar knew nothing till it was too late; neither had be thrength enough remaining, after this great loffe, to continue the felige; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the River Bagradus, where he incamped.

CHAP.2. S.3.

The terrour was no lesse within Carthage, ypon the same of this losse; than had beene the joy of the late great victorie. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, under stame, whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines surroung the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one sole Generall, neare vnto their Citie (for they are knownet to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hashie exigent, to deuise about repealing it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring stame to Amilears campe, and by all good perswassions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilear in his honour, that the carelessesses of the senate to be imputed unto him, by sending his enemie to moderate his proceedings. Neuerthelesse after many confreences, the authoritie of the Senatours preculaid? A milear and them were made striends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, stame tooke warning by stambals calamities, to followe good directions, though afterwards hee returned to his old and times. As addedly harted.

In the meane feafon Matho was come abroad; as meaning to vse the reputation 20 of his late fuccesse, while thit gaue some life vnto his bussinesse. He had reason to doe ashe did: but he wanted skill to deale with Anticar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Anticartained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the strongth, and withall diminish the credit of Matho, that he resolved to trie the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his desires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being wearie of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approved it selvin many trials 3 and well as fured of Anticar his great worth, whereunto the enemie had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: inuigoting their friends to helpe; and drawing foorth into the fielde, all that lay in Garison.

The iffue of this Battaile might have beene foretold, without helpe of witchchraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to prefume, faue their daring spirits, which had beene well cooled by the many late skirmilhes, wherein they had learned how to runne away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as bauing often beene victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a commander, as was not cafily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the defire of libertie should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude; as the honour of their 40 State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wanne a great victorie, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were flaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himfelfe was taken aline. Immediatly upon this victoric, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vica onely, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they described of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleafed the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be devised, in recompence of the mischiefes which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and a-50 bout foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Cathaginians whose fubicets did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercinaries, have prevented in the beginning.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Handers. The faithleffe dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia. contrarie to the peace.

Hilest Matho and Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Africk; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire 10 in Sardinia: where murdering Boffar the Gouernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vie. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Armie, (fuch as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the fudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safetie, and present profit, to iowne themselves with those that were alreadic revolted. than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practife with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away 20 all icalousie and distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practife it hath beene in all Ages, with those that have vndertaken the quarrell of an vniust warre, to enjoyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offerto partake, and to affift the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some fuch Actions, as are equally vnpardonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaisms, fent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedamonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly poffett himfelfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did 39 not onely spare the facke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equal freedome with the rest of the Cities united. These Renolts are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conqueîts of newe fortunes, and making of newe parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of olde friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by old enemies. Ces font les coups de viville eferime. Thefe, (fay the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercinaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spending, and his affociates: onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Handers were no leffe glad, than the fouldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they 40 could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the fouldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwife, the foundiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolved vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) have rifen, betweene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vnlesse the riches of Carthage, had ferued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not eafily taken up. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to faue themselves in 112-50 lie. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refufed, vpon reasons that follow.

the Carthaginians tooke almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hercof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring fatisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly veelded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carrie all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbeare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vtica, offering it felfe vnto their subjection. This might have ferued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the iffue proved, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriuing better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilear: who had he beene ouerthrown by Spendius or Mathe, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of merciles villaines, or haue humbled her felfe under prorection of the Romans, with whom shee had lately striuen for superioritie. That extreame necessitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farre from fuch amiserable choice. Wherefore it was not wisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but 20 finking thippe, to runne her felfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was we'll ended in Africk, and the Carthaginians began to prepaire for the recourie of Sarainia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recoursed her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercinaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enfeebled and impourrished Citie, under a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for SARDINIA, were made indeed against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to relist; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in re-20 compence belike (for I fee not what reason they could alleage) of the great feare which they had endured, of an invalion from Carthage. It is indeed plaine, that they impudently fought occasion of warre. But necessitie taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paied, how hardly focuer it was raifed. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: she herselfe hath broken the peace alreadie, which Amilear purposeth to make her dearely repent; but what Amilear lives not to performe, shall be eaccomplished by Hannibal his renouned fonne.

How the affaires of Carthage went betweene the African Rebellion, and the lecond Punicke Warre.

He iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; ferued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient vnto those that were more mightie. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easilie tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The frength, and the icalousie of the Romans, forbade all attempts upon the Mediterranseas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknowen to Rome: whereforethat Province might ferue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decaied forces, with all needfull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and sourraigne trust was committed vnto Amilear: vpon

Hanne, with some other envious men, that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilear and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most worthie of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; adulting men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whole amitte they faid, that the felicitic of Carthage did contift. By such discourses, harth to the cares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Commonweale; they got none other reputation, than of fingularitie : which the ignorant fort suspected to be wisedome.

But the gloric of Amilear was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable fernices that he did, to the fingular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibralter) and landed on the westerne coast of Spaine; in which Countrie, during nine yearesthat he liued there, he subjected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, ina battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and same, by which in many fignall victories, he had aquired the name of a fecond Mars.

After the death of Amilear; Asidrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the 20 Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practife and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subicets and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to growcicalous againe of this hastic increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not a little troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formetly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their 30 neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselues in a warre of farre leffeimportance, (whereof I shall speake anone) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to bee feared: it is enough if hee request; fince his request shall have the vertue of 2 command.

Yet were the Romans vtterly destitute of all good colour; that might helpe them 40 to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquained with Rome, whereof (in probabilitic) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Afdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had beene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should forbeare to proceed any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citic 50 of Carthage; they seeme to have hoped, that how socuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to avoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the braueric of one man might proue more fastidious, and, resenting the injurie, returne such answere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, quarrell, that they fo much defired; and might embrace at leafure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Astrabal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diflike at all; and whereas they would have this infolent copenant inferred into the articles of peace; he tooke voon him to doe it, of his owner nower, with fuch appearance of conformitie to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had beene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preffed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Afdrub. 1; yet should it not have Rood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, vnlesse an oath had also beene extorted, to make all fure. But fince all passed quietly, vnder the bare authoritic of Afdrubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periurie, (as they after did) for refusing to fland to it.

By this Treatie with Afarubal, the Romans wanne some reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be militeffe ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiving blowes from a stouter Dame; there were foone found fome, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-feruants with Carthage. But the Car-20 thaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South fide of therus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemic in warre to the Carthaginians) into their focietie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neverthelesse, if wee consider the late agreement made with Afdrubal; wee shall finde that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not passe, in any Discoucrie or Conquest by them intended to bee made upon Spaine: in which 30 regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one fide of Iberus, whereas Carthage. on the other fide of that River, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were; this indignitie was not fo cafily digefted, as former injuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they lift. In such 40 termes were the Carthaginians, when Afdrubal died, after hee had commanded in Spaine eight yeeres: (being flaine by a flaue, whose mafter hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, fonne of the Great Amilear, was chosen Generall in his

The estate of Greece from the death of PYRRHVS, to the raigne of PHILIP the Conne of DEMETRIVE

N the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The to whole countrie had recoursed, by degrees, a forme of libertie: the pettie tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each upon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, asnot onely ferued to defend themselues, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like diffensions and tumults in Macedon, as had beene in Greece, when Philip first began to incroch vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigoniu, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning sixe and thirtie 20 yeeres; yet fo, that hee was divers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gaules. and by Pyrrhus, as hath beene alreadic shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him by the reuolt of his fouldiours, even at fuch time, as having overthrowne with great flaughter an Armie of the Gaules, hee was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom hee compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his yong sonne Demetrius raised an Armie; wherewith he chaced Aexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epiru, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this yong Prince Demetrius (though in another kinde) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of 30 Greece. This Citadel called Acrocorinthus, flood vpon a fleep rockie hill on the North fide of the towne; and was by nature and art fo ftrong, that it feemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Lecan and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the Maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commoditie of the two Seas, youn both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolus his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great huffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it paf- 40 fed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing elfe, than that he was thought to bee poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a tricke. The device was this. Antigonus sent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicas, and seeke her marrage. The foolish olde widdowe perceived not how unfit a match the was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was enen as readie to consent, as was his sonne to desire it, and came this rher in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all forts of games: in the middeft of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whose icalousie had been ex- 50 ceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauitie beseeming his old age. But as bee had stollen it; so was it againe stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being alreadie spent with age.

CHAP.2. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten veeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Etolians, and Achaans, held him continually busied in warre : wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decaie : and the Grecians to call off their yoke.

Philip, the onely fonne of Demetrius, was a yong child when his father died and therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minoritic of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though hee refnected Philip as his owne fonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Dalon, that is as much as Will-gine, because he was flow in his liberalitie. He represfed the Dardanians, and The falsans, which molefted his Kingdome, in the beginning ofhis raigne. Vpon confidence of this good feruice, hee tooke state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, than onely a Protectour. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appealed by faire words, and a seeming unwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouernment. The tehaians tooke from him the Citie of Athens, foone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all or most that hee held in Greece, if their owne estate had not beene endangered by a nearer enemie. But citile diffention. 20 which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew it eafily now againe, when it had fearcely recovered tirength after a long fickneffe: and gaue to this Antigonus no leffe authoritie therein, than Philip, the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

These Achaians, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greekes. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their elemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their lone and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to bee governed by one Lawe, and to vse 20 one and the same fort of waights, measure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vniced them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had beene by the Macedonian Captaines divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclide, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes posses the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whome, when his fonnes fought to change the Legall government of their Predeceffours into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as feeming most equall. This forme of Commonweale had continuance, with some small 40 changes according to the diuerlitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had caten vp a little before the Battaile of Leuclres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a warre, no leffe foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentith Olympiad, in which, or neare it, Ptolomie the sonne of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Piolomie Ceraumus, left the world; two of the ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimai, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For having 50 beene, some of them Partisans with fundrie Atuedonian Captaines, and others hauing beene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to fasten themselues in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voiage into Italie. Now after the vniting of the Patrenses and Dimei, to whome also the Cities of Tritea, and Phara, ioyned themselves;

Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceramians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentic and fine yeares, vied the same forme of Gouernment with the Achaians; who by a Senatoric and two Prators, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and some after, by one Pretor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the second

CHAP.2. S.6.

This Aratus was a noble yong Gentleman of Siegon, who living at Argos in exile. whilest his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chaced the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of An- 10 tigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greekes, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicronians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it received more increase. by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction ferued well enough against Antigonus, whose subtletie was som what greater than his valour. As the industrie and counsaile of Aratus delivered his Countrie from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league: fo further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuerties, betweene the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same 20 mony he drew many others to affift him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the fingular good of all Achaia. The monie he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of £gypt; who partly had a defire to hold fome strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous votage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sieyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Aroscorinthus or Citadello sCorinth, which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by some therees that he had hired for the purpose, who situing in the place, had practifed to rob Artigonus his treasurie, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was 30 he faine to fight for it, ere hee could get it: though indeed Antigonus his Souldiers were rather oner-come by their owne searce, than by any force of the assains were midfuling left the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and hausing loss of the placeal readie, ypon which they had prefumed; before they were aware of any enemie.

In these kinde of night-seruices, ambushments, surprises, and practifes, Aratum was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some case approued) might looke pale and tremble, when the beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortiude were dimerssible, when the sundrienatures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto seuerall forts of action. In resoluting which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standed in neede of little practife; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vs. good successes, and other helps, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere assection to his Countrie he was unreproueable, and so acknowledged: as his sollowing actions will resiliate.

When Assessing has deaded and the Epidaurians: whereby this new credit of Abbia, the Megarians revolted foone after from Antigonus, and entred into the fame Corpogration. So did the Treezenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new credit of State grew for powerful, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macconiums; and arges, and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprife vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to they his strength, and fent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the Citie by thew of loue; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honelt flaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citic, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have wonne it, if the Citizens would have lent any helpe to the recoucrie of their owne freedome; fundrie times, and with diverse event, they fought with the Tyrants (who rose vp one after another in Arges) in open field, and flue one of them in battaile; but all fufficed not: untillat length Ariflomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to refigne his estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians. Whilest this businesse with the Argines was on foot, Lyliadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis was fo well handled by dratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got fuch credit, that hee was chosen Generall of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two yeares together by one man) cuery fecond yeare, for a certaine while, Hee and Aratus succeeding one another by turnes. Butthoselate Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysiadas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion, from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare 20 in due time.

The Acheans having obtayned so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolanie King Of £27pt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the Sonne Of Antigonus Genatus, for the libertie of Athens. It is strange and worthie of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile, the Athenium wore Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonnet he victorie. Such were now the Athenium become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude. Aut humiliter servit, ant suppose the minimum is to the strain service, or insolant in command. Neuerthels of when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie which he could not by sorce; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased libertieto the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Athenians, lowing them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entrednot, scorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne gloric. Now as the Common-wealth of Achain daily increased within Peloponnesus, by inflice and honestie; so did the Ætolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponne fus it felfe, waxe very powerfull, by sturdinesse of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves 40 against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doc and suffer much; partly by the naturall strength and fastnesse of their Countrie; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other bulinesse, as hath beene related. They had molested Cassander, in favour of Antigonus; and were themselues as much plagued by him, and by the Asarnanians, a little, but stout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the sonne of the first Antigonus, and more or lesse, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponne fus: fo that they were hardened with perpetual travaile; seldome putting off their Armour. But their hardinesse ill deserved the name of va-50 lour, seeing they had no regard of honestic or friendship; measuring all things by their owne infolent will, and thinking al people base minded, that were not as sierce andoutragious as themselues.

Pallene; where although they were foundly beaten by Aratus, yet their defire of gaine made them greedie of a new voiage thither, as to a Countrie wherin som what was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the fonne of Antigonius Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driven to feeke helpe of the Achaans; which they obtained. The warre which the Achaans made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponne fus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the . E. tolians, at whose instance it was set on foot : for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Etolians, giving thankes in wordes, devised how to require the benefit 10 with some great mischiefe. They saw that the Achaens were desirous, to bring all Peloponne us into their Alliance and Corporation : of which intent, the Lacedamonians were very icalous. Wherefore these Etolians laboured carnellly, to set the Lacedamonians and Acheans together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called into helpe (it skilled not on what side) and fo get no small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their device vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many loffes, that his Kingdom had fustained by the Achaans. Of this plot Aratus was aware : who therefore determined to fuffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedamonians cause to 20 take armes. But this refolution was taken fomewhat too late; and not altogether in his owne power to hold. He had beene medling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedamon: and thereby had prouoked the Lacedamonians to looke about them; feeing that all Peloponne fus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was alreadic become Achean.

The Citic of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Etolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Anarice and Luxurie raigned among them. the poore was oppressed by the rich, and the generositie of spirit, that had sometime 20 beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparts no more than feuen hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not about one hundred had lands; all the rest were needle people, and desirous of innouation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agia a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lyeurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an A&, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal division of lands. All the yonger, and the poorer fort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part; being himfelfea diffolute man, as one trained up in the 40 Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citic, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counfailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne private commoditie. They were hastie to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they themfelues were deeply indebted: but the division of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these menincreased, by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leamidas was brought home, and reftored to his Kingdome, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuarie; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was difmissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawne into prison, and there by his 50 enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparia: and ( which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the lawes, vling their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and ferued to effabilith the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppreflors. In which case Aratus might well hope, to adioyne Lacedamon to the Achaan Common-wealth: though it were great multice to take sinch aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponness, and to the benefit of Spartait selfe, if it could have beene wrought by perswassion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death

10 of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Achaans, even in their owne kinde: obtruding upon them by force, an union of all Peloponne u; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedamonians and their King, should have beene the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be flaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in mariage (perforce) to his owne some Cleamenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and fought to winne-her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pittying his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agu had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilst he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all 20 occasions of warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in focorrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephorigaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenaum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but fought to take by surprise Teges and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedamonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painefull nights trauaile, and discouered his enmitte to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing forrie-By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Atolian practife, and therefore would have staied the quarrell from proceeding 30 too farre. But Lyfiadas and Aristomachus would needes fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so vrgent. Aristomachus was at that time General of the Acheans, (He & Lysiadas being of great account, fince they had abandoned their tyrannie) who fent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his affistance in a journie to be made into Laconia. No diffwasions of Aratus would ferue: therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, litlepleafing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, hedurst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus, who desired to giue battaile. Yet had the Achaans twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than finethousand in all. This game repu-40 tation to the Lacedamonian, and raifed an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lyfiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuerthelesse the Acheans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the year following, against Lysiadas his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe: it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the flanderous wordes of Lyfiadas. Therefore he purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neare vnto the Mount Lycaus, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to have beene slaine, This misaduenture Aratus recompensed by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly have been ex-50 pected, had he been victorious. For whilft there was no fulpition of any great matter that he could vidertake, he fecretly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans had once before joyned themselves with the Athaians; but shortly vpon seare, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Atolians; and from the Atolians, presently after this victoric, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achaan societie. As this good fuccesse repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleame. nes and he encountred neare vnto Megalopolis; where the Achaans had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lysiadas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedamonians, whom hee routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driven back vpon their owne Companions; in fuch fort, to that finally all the Armie was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great loffe. and incenfed the Acheans against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheleffe; wherein though Cleamenes wanne fome Townes, and A. ratus got the better in one small fight, yet litle of importance was done; the Acheans being wearie, and the Spartan King intentine to another businesse.

Cleomenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painefull journies, for sooke the Achean warre on a sudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where hee flue the Ephori, and restored by force 20 the ancient discipline of Lyeurgus. Then gave hee an accompt of his doings; and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched upon the power of Kings, and many disorders had growne in the Citie; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal I division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: fo that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether fland in neede of mercinarie helpe, as it lately had done, to faue it felfe from the Atolians, Illyrians, and other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spertans well fatisfied; and Cleomenes himfelfereadie in the field, ere his enemies could take advantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Acheans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durst iffue forth of the Citic, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long cre they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; hadranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea. and readic to take other places, even of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, hee proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Laced amonians refumed their ancient courage; and he himfelfe had the heart to demand the Principalitie of Greec. Hedid not therefore henceforth contend, about the possession 40 of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or loofe all. The Atolians, in facour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side; and whereas he had gotten Mantinea, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and saw that Antigonus with the Atolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore hee denifed how to prouide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not bee) to faue all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, hee refused; fearing to bee so farre prest as to hazzard in one battaile all so the force of his Countrie, to which as hee had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, fo was his manner of warfare otherwife. For he commonly attempted by surprise, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irifh, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not for fake the care of the weale publike, though in aiming at the generall good, it seemes that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantines had not only opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but flaine the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once T yrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Acheans, was now revolted vnto the enemic, following the fortune of Cleamenes. Prolemie was too farre off to helpe; and the nearenefle of Antigonus was very dange-10 rous ; yet might be viefull, if this King would (as Polybius faith) like others, be friend or enemic, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practifed with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpose; and intructed them how to deale with both Antigonus, and the Acheans.

CHAP.2. S.6.

The Citie of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, ever fince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay nearest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deferued fuccour; yet could not well bee relieued by the Acheans, with their owne proper ftrength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should bee sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting scaue and 20 good allowance, to trie the fanour of Antigonus in their necessitic. This was granted, for lack of what elfe to answere : and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecesfours; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aide. But when they delivered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his owne great loffe or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaans under the Patronage of 30 Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentiue eare to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the Achaans good liking. Particularly he commended himselse, by these Messengers. to Aratus; affuring them, that he thought himselfehighly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have beene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only vpon a just and worthic loue to his owne Nation. With this answere they returne to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedie conclusion, as the ne-

cessitie of the time required. 40 The Acheans were gladto heare, that Antigonus was fo inclinable to their defire; and therefore were readicto entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisedome of his Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safetie; adding neuerthelesse, that it were not amisse, first of all to trie their owne a bilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus hee shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that hee might not afterward fustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; fince it might appeare, that he had not beene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that to leifurably, the generall confent.

Neuerthelesse in true estimation , this finenesse of Aratus might have beene vsed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie course. For it had beene more honourable, to make an end of the Warre, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: fince therby he should both haue freed his

Countrie from all further trouble; and withall should have restored vnto the vniucrfall state of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue having rifen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principalitie, by length of time, and successe of many actions; can ill endure the hastie growth of any others reputation, wherewith it fees it felfe likely to bee ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedamonians there was none; than that they lately had been in dangerous case : neither could any reason be found, why Aretus should prefer Antigonus before Cleamenes, than that he had flood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherfore he was justly plagued, when he faw 10 his owne honors reuerfed by the infolent Macedonians; and in itead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules, was faine to doe facrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whole Nobilitie was but of flue descents, and whom perhaps he might have feenehis fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolomie was loft: who forthwith tooke part with Cleamenes, though he did not supply him with such liberalitie, as hee had vied to the Acheans; being warned, as may feeme, by their example, to be more warie both intrusting and diffourling. Cleomenes himselfe, whilest this businesse with An. tigonus was a foot, paffed through Areadia with an Armie, and laboured by al meanes 20 to draw the Acheans to battaile. At the Citic of Dymes in Achaia were affembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their efface, without feeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where hee had fo great a victorie, that the enemie was no longerable to keepe the open field. The calamitie was fuch, that Aratus himselfe durft not take upon him to be their General, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens were compelled to fue for peace; which was granted upon this casie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedamonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would 30 condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prifoners ranfom-free: also that they should enjoy their owne Lawes and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleamenes was very pleasing to the Achaens: who desired him to come vnto the Citic of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre. Now feemed the affaires of Greece likely to bee fetled in better order, than they had ever beene fince the beginning of the Peloponnesian. Warres, yea or fince the Perfian Inuation: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme fick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to 40 be deferred to another time. Neuerthelesse he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners. to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Acheans in their defire of his friendship: who affembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and sought by great wordes, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of refoluing. When all would not ferue turne, he betooke himfelfe to his cunning; and fent word to Cleomenes, that hee should doe well to leave his Armic behinde him, and comealone into Argos, receiving Holtages for fafetic of his person. Cleomenes was alreadie farre on his way, when he met with this advertisement: and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had beene an easie matter, to have told him so so much at the first, and not have made him come so farre with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismisse. Yet that which chiefly seemes to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would ad-

uenture himselfeinto the Citie, then to deprive him of all Royall shew, that might breede respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeede which Aratus feared, and for which he fought to hinder his comming thither in person : lest the people, hearing the promifes of Cleamenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle wordes, and finish the bargaine without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these ingling tricks: and Aratus was not farre behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betweene feare of the one, and renerence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all as it were to fortune. Cleamenes , tooke his aduantage of their present weakenesse, and renewed the Warre. Many Citics yeelded vnto him willingly; many heeforced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Arges, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doc. In this cale Aratus fent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Acheans. Intigonus gave as good words as could be wished: saving that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promifed to helpe the Horse against his enemie the Stagge: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himselfe to bee sadled and bridled Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way descrued, to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and fent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should bee readie to let him in. The Corinthians on the other fide ranne to Cleamenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to faue it from Antigonus, by furrounding it with Trenches, that none might iffue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was in doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner; to whom hee sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agree-30 ment, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus: promiling that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would hee give him double the same pension, which hee had beene wont to receive of King Ptolemic. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold affured foueraigntie of the Countrie; he defired that it might not becommitted vnto his owne disposition, but be joyntly kept by the Lacedamonians and Acheans. All this entreatic ferued to no purpole. For Arains, rejecting veterly the motion, fent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Acheans, to put Acrocorinthus into his handes. Which when Cleomenes vnderflood, he leifed upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrie of Sieyon, 40 whereof this his Aduersarie was natiue, Antigonus in the meane time drew neare to the Isthmus; having passed with his

Anticopus in the meane time drew neare to the Islamia; finding parted within Armie through Eubaa, becaule the Æleian; held the fireights of Thermopple againsh him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatmess, where the Meacedonians might attaine by the good successed of the southern of the Meacedonians might attaine by the good successed of this internance; and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to bazzard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Anticopous therefore laboured hard to make his way by sorce; but he was not able so to doe: hee secretly got into the Cerinthian Hauen; but was 50 violently driven out againe, with great losse of men, finally he resoluted to turne a fide, and secke a passing outer the gulfe of Cerinth, to Siegon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily

In this perplexitic newes from Argos came by Sca, that greatly comforted Antigonus, 408

Antigonus having shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wanne such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored 30 them to the old Poffesfors. This done, he tooke his way to Egium, where was held a Parliament by the deheans: to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Achaans were not behinde withhim; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into couenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somwhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart : carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not only feafted him as a great Prince, but fuffered more than humane honours, as facrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Si- 40 cyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (for sooth) a very wise bargaine, if in stead of Cleomenes that would have beene a King, it had obtayned the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achean. This was hardly taken : yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Arges, were againe creeted by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he hade rected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downeby the same King, and one only left vnto himselse at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Neuerthelesse in taking re- to uenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his owne passion by the aide of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had beene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Acheans; and from them revolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like fort handled hee (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and crueltie shewed to the Acheans. For he flue all the principall Citizens, and fold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bond-flaues; dividing the spoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Acheans. The Towne it selfe was given by Antigonus to the Argines: who peopled it with a Colonie of their owne; and dratus hauing charge of this businesse, caused it to beenew named Antigonia. Surely of this crueltie there can bee no better excuse; than euen the flatterie, which Aratus was driven to vie to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of servilitie, whereinto they had veged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Maced nian wrought, in the Civill state of the Acheans; Let vs returne vnto his warre against the Lacedamonian. The next Sommer Antigonus wanne Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenus, Herea, and Telphulla. Muntimes he dispeopled, as was faid before; in Orchomenius he placed a Garrison of his Maccelonians; the rest he restored to the Acheans: with whom he wintred at Agium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where hee lay readie to defend his owne Territoric. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinea, and to those other Townesthat hee wanne, was this: Hee had few Souland diers, and not monie enough to wage more. Ptolemie the Egyptian promifed much, but would performe nothing, valetic he might have Cleamenes his owne Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypt; yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was flow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himfelfe, as well as his owne abilitic would ferue. He manumifed all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedamonian flaues: taking monie for their libertie, and arming two thoufand of them, after the Macedonian falhion. Having thus increased his forces, hee came on the fudden to Megalopolis; that lay fecure, as having defended it felfe in more dangerous times, and having now Antigenus neare at hand in Agium. The 30 Towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, tole hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Towns and goods to them againe, if they would bee of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Spartua great bootie that he found therein. These newes altonished the Achesins at Æzium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus fent hastily for his Mucdonians, out of their wintering places : but they were fo long in comming, that Cleomenes was fafely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Arges, there to passe the rest of this valuekie winter, somewhat 40 further from the eyes of the grieued Achaans. When he had laine awhile at Argos, Cleamenes was at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argines perceiuing that their Countrie would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not iffue into the field; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wifer, than to be moved with their clamours; and fuffered them to fee their villages burnt sto bid him refigne his Office of Protector, vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish wordes; rather than hee would be over-come in fight, and thereby loofe more honour than could eafily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his defire, in weakning the reputation of his enemie: though he thereby added neither followers nor other strength, vnto Afterwards, when the scason was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requite these brauado's of his enemie, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the warre from his ownegates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrie of Argos, where he made Mmmmm fuch hauock, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended invalion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting the Spartan King ; that ranging over the Countrie of the Argines, Phliasians , and Orchomenians. draue a Garrison of his out of oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face. in the suburbs of Arges, without the Temple of June, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet served to dishearten the Achaan fide, and to fill the enemie with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard, of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by fetting vp his rest, without more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Armie eight and twentie thousand foot, and 10 twelve hundred horse, collected out of sundrie Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Buotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Acheans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all forts, twentie thousand, with which he lay at Selafia: fortifying flightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to feeke entrance. Antigonus coming to Selafia, found his enemic to strongly incamped, upon and between the hils of Ena and olympus, that he was confirmined to fpend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which hee greatly defired, without the hazzard of his whole Armie, in affayling their well-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes 20 and feares) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the Hill Ena : but his Illyrians were fo ill seconded by the Achean foot, that the Spartan horse, & light-armed foot, incamped in the streight vallie between those hils, issuing forth, fell your their skirts; and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleamenes himselfe had stood in that part of the bataile, he would have made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclidas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing : who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke fuch benefit as the ground affoorded, whereon he lay. Philopamen the Areadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, ferued then on 30 horse, as a private yong man, among the Acheans. Hee seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Armie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achean horse, to breake upon the Spartan Mercinaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth, and want of charge; partly, for that Anigonus had given order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they received a figne from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly, than well aduifed; entreated fome of his owne Countrimen to follow him; gaue a charge upon the Spartans; and forced them not only to leave the Illyrians, but fecke how to faue themselves. Being so farre advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to bee wonne, 40 through the vnskilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perfwaded the men at armes his Companions to doe the like : the folly of Euclidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that as cended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight your even termes. So he recoucred the Hill top; where though he was fore hurt, yet hee made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedamomans were beaten from it, with great flaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclidas, made Cleomenes loofe the day : who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe; was like to have beene furrounded and loft, if he had not withdrawne himfelfe with an ex-50 traordinarie speede. In this battaile, ended the glorie of Lacedamon; which, as a light readie to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where hee had no defire to stay, finding only two hundred left, of fixe thousand Spartans that hee had led vnto this battaile, and most of hishired Souldiers dead, or goneaway. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves vnto antigonus; and promiting to doe all that should at any time lie in his owne power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before prouided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Agypt. He was louingly entertayned by Ptolemie Euergetes; who vindertooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gailant behaviour and qualities. In the meane feafon hee had a penilon allowed him, of foure and twentie talents, yearely. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious yong Prince. wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleamenes was desirous to returne into Grecce, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptolemie, and his Minions, would neither give him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he defired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because hee was too well acquainted with the weakeneile of Egypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deutled matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last of him was; that with thirtie of his Countrimen, hee vndertooke 20 a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the A exandrians torchell, and feeke their libertie. In which attempt hee flue fome enemies of his that he met; and having walked vp and downe the streets, without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) He, and his Companions, agreed together to bee Ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptolemie was bold to fliew his indignation : and flue his Mother and Children, that had beene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wines of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to 30 come to fuch a bloudie end, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grandchildren.

CHAP.2. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

After the Victorie at Sellasa, Antigonus without relistance entred Sparta: whereinto neuer the force of any Enemic, before him, could make way. Hee kindly entreated the Civizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Governement: tarrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which he haftened out of Peloponnesw, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedie departure was, an advertisement that he received out of Mucedon; how the Illyrians over-ranne, and destroicd the Countrie. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wife tarried, a few 40 dayes after the fight, in Sparia: the Kingdome of Lacedemon would have stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise de-

Antigonus foughtagreat battaile with the Illyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein hee caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-strayning his voice; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space similhed his life, who was troubled before with a confumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the sonne of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why ) the Great; and Piolemie Philopater; beganne to raigne in Asia, and Agypt; Boies all. Of these, Ptolemie, 50 though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuenteene yeares of his raigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsuall in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon Mmmmm 2 which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

ð. VII.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Hilest thinges thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselves worke among the Sardinians and Corficans, that were eafily fubdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gaules they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather. as Liuie faith, a tumult than a warre. So that by all thefe light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from ruft. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea; it bath beene shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to be vtterly filent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Countrie, now called Slauonia: a troublefome Nation, 20 impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without other regard of friend or foc. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Chacedon, to helpe the Mydionians, his friends, that were belieged by the Etolians, for that they refused to be of their focietie. Before the Illy rian fuccours came, the Mydionians were fo farre front. that the Atolians contended about the bootie: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honor of the victorie, and the division of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the fiege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later 20 ages, who thought vpon dividing the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they loft, at Poitiers and at Agincourt. The Liolians wifely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should bee ioyntly intitled in the victorie, and have equall authoritie, in distribution of the gettings. But the illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Atolians; and though good refistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their owne businesse, but stoutly fallied out of the Towne. Many of the Atolians were flaine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was loft : the Illy- 42 rians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydionians creected a Trophic, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chosenew Officers at the fame time) as the Atolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voiage, highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the monic, wherewith Demetrius had hired his affiftance; or of the bootie that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greekes, bee found it not vneasie, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For joy of this, he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Tenta, his wife.

Tentagane her people free libertie, to robbe all Nations at Sea, making no diffe rence betweene friend and foe; as if thee had beene fole Mistresse of the falt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and fent it into Greece; willing her Captaines, to make Warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and staied at the Citic of Phanice to take in victuailes and other necessaries. There lay in Phanice eight hundred Gaules; that having beene Mercinaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they neverthelesse revolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Towne. The Gaules were foone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betraied Phanice 3 which deferued none other, in trufting them. All Epirus was prefently in armes, and hastned to drive out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Scerdilaidas; whom Queene Teuta had fent to helpe his fellowes. V pon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, and the streights adjoyning, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrie; another part of them remaines at Phynice, to continue the fiege. Neither the one, nor the other, fped well in their businesse. For Scerdilai das found meanes to joyne with his fellowes; and they that were befreged within Phaniee, fallied out of the towne, and gaue fuch an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of fauing their Countrie, without great and speedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the deheans and Ætolians: crauing their helpe, with very pittifull termes of entreatie. They obtayned their fait; neither was it long, before an Armie, fent by these two Nations, was readie in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdila; las. But Scerdila; las was called home, by letters from Teuta the Queene, that fignified a rebellion of fome Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered compolition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransometheir Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootic and slaves. Having made this profitable 20 and honourable bargaine; the Illyrians returned into their owne Countrie by Land. fending their bootic away by Sea.

of the Historie of the World.

Attheir comming home, they found no fuch great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voiage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whilest they lay at Phanice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Teuta, that shee should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that shee had, in short space, tamed her Rebells, and brought all to good order, fauc only the towne of 1//a, which 40 her forces held streightly belieged. Swelling with this prosperitie, shee could hardly affoord a good looke to the vinmannerly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyracie, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, shee vouchsafed to tell them, That injurie in publike shee would doe them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings, to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they best could, by Sea. But (faid the yonger of the two Embassadours) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those private wrongs, that are borne out by publike authoritie: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine : as if that had beene the way, to set her heart at rest; which was indeede the meane, to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadours into divers parts of Greece, fignifying their love to the Countrie, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Teuta, and her people. They hoped be-like, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage:

matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thankes; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the 1/th-

therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in

After this good beginning, the Confull failed alongst the coast, to apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailer and guide. against her. Shee was indeede in an errour; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and leffe than shee, both before and since : Hauing more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the £tolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had shee easily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans shee should be litle troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought 30 fuch wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that nevertheleffe, it prevailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; thee would have continued to vie her advantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that shee should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mightie than her selfe. But shee was a woman, and did what shee listed. Shee sent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Phares; with the like ample commission, to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it selfe; and one part of it fell with 2 Dyrrachium; the other, with Coreyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprized by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In b Corcyra the Illyrians landed; 40 wasted the Isle; and belieged the Towne. Hereupon the Atolians and Acheans were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; loofing, belides others of leffe note, Marcus Carynenfis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Coreyra, difmaied with this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illirian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Teuta was angrie with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolued to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were cuen readie to put to Sca, though vncertaine which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fuluius the Confull, of Demetrius his 50 feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; where hee found the Towne of Coreyra fo well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illgrian Garrison, and Submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

Sea, confifting of two hundred faile, commanded by C. Fuluius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring fatisfaction: for this injurie is of fuch nature, as must be requited with mortall warre, It is indeede contrarie to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to bee this; that since without mediation. there would never be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a leffontaught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, and in fafetie, betweene enemies. Neuertheleffe, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embassashould draw into the quarrell; then is it as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embasfadours (thus imploied, to make the warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subjects, of an enemie. And so might the Athenians have answered it. when they flue the Lacedamonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which prachife against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law what soener. For whereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practife against the no printledge at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians, and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the flaughter of their Embaffadour Coruncanus. The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stirre

Greece, faue a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the comming of HANNIBAL into Italie.

He Gaules that dwelt in Lumbardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; fometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the affistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that warre proued not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. 40 Many ouerthrowes they received; and if they got any victorie, it yeelded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more serce, than well aduised: lightly stirred up to warre, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were faid to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwaies carefull heede to their approch, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was fudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumultus Galliei; tumults of the Gaules; and right. ly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vied to rife with great Armies: but 50 after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow; they would rest ten, or twelue yeares, fometimes twentie or thirtie: till they were stirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested; the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive warre, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which hee intended to raife: that the Gaules never fell vpon Italie, with a mightie power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was trauailing in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punick warres: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to vie their times : and were therefore like to fmart, when focuer the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leifure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punick Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to set 10 vpon the Gaules in their owne Countrie: and that was three yeares before the comming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules invading Hetruria, and belieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile, and flaine L. Cacilius with the most of his Armie. Manius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these Embassadours they sue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it fo well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrie, and sent a Colonic of their owner to inhabit it. This caused the Boi, another people of Gaule, to scare the like meafure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their fide. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them fue for peace, 20 which lasted untill this end of the Illyrian warre.

It vexed the Gaules, to see a Roman Colonie planted in their Countrie; who had been eaccustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines ( fo the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are nearer; like as they called cifalpines, or by-bither the Alpes, those who dwelt betweene them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their partie: reasonably presuming, that as their diffunction had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpines and Transalpines, fell together by the cares: putting the Romans only to a tumult, without fur- 20 ther trouble of warre: Soone after, they were viged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, belides one Colonie alreadie planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would ferue to people the whole Countrie betweene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vtterly those Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it felfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude. But the Commonaltie of Rome tooke this in so good part, not with standing all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boy: who being Neighbours 40 to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because all the rest of the Guides had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be erooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Influrian, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joyned with the Boy, and ypon a common purse entertained the Gessides, Nations about Rhodamus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessides, Nations about Rhodamus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessides, Concolitanus and Antrees, start who with the Boy and Insurians, compound an Armie of fistic thousand foot, and two tie thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that cuer invaded the Reman Territorie; to whom, the Sono-galli, that had beene beaten out of their possessides, and those of the possessides, the soften perfect of the Romans and the Feenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeuing in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For seare of whose incursions therefore, the Guiles were forced to leave a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entred into Tusane. The Romans hearing of this danger,

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the confideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gaules had affembled, they caused a view to bee taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themfelues, to oppose the incurtions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne defirmation could not bee preuented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: bea cause they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulls they fent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne : euery Legion confuling of fine thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand text, and two thousand horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any miladuenture came to thele) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thouland foot, and foure thousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Vinbri and Sar/inates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentiethousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twentiethousand: which latter Armies were directed, to inuade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules should be thereby greatly dimi-20 nilhed. There were befides these, to bee readie against all uncertaine chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fifteene hundred horse, garrisond in Rome it selte, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Ouer and about these great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbred fourescore thousand foot, and fine thousand horse; in that of the Sammites, seventie thousand foot, and of horse seven thousand; in that of the B Tapyges, and Mellapyges, fiftie thousand foot, and sixteene thousand horse: the Lucans sent a lift of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the h Marli, i Marrueini, k Ferentani, and the Vestini, of twentic thousand foot, and foure thousand horse. The Romans had allo two Legions in Sicil, and about Taventum, 20 contayning eight thousand foure hundred foot, and foure hundred horse. So as of the Remans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse, three and twen-

Roman Armie, fent into Tufcane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had miffed of them came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their journic. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head; and in the fame cuening discourred the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratageme: that shewed no great fineneffe of wit, but fuch, as well beformed those that had none other occupation than warre; and flood them in good flead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leaving their horse in guard; to whom they give order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speede, as might 10 rather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their hallie departure, as the Gaules delired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules returne; charge them; and kill fixe thousand upon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of advantage, and defend themselues, till L. Emilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the comming of the Confull, the Gaules confult, whether they should give the Romans battaile, or forbeare. In which difpute, Ancrocflus, one of their Kings, perswades them , rather to returne into their owne Countries; where after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, peffer, or other impediment. This aduice they all 29 embrace; for feeing they that were Mercinaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wiscdome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This indeede had beene a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemie had beene in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemie, they finde within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In furbeafes the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which forfakes 30 the field, perceives, and feares, fome advantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betraier of those succours that Reason offereth, when it bath once possess the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and understanding. They that make theretrait, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, seare to be ingaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heeles that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, runne, and perish, if those that sauour the retrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miferable overthrow, that the French received in Noples, in the yeare 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Aurques of Sal, doth tellifie no leffe. For although a great troupe of French borfe, fullayned the purfuing enemie a long time, and gaue the foot leifure to trotaway; yet being retarded by often tur- 42 nings, the Spaniff foot ouer-tooke, and defeated them vtterly. During the warres betweene the Imperialls, and the French; Boili and Mont were loft at Brignolles, who in a brauerie would needes fee the enemie, before they left the field. So was Streft ouerthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wifely : when without respect of point of honour, he distodged from before Landerfey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not sinding themselues in case to give battaile) have done. It ne tronue point ( faith the Marshall MONLVC) au fait des armes chose si disficile, qu'one retrait; I finde nothing in the arte of warre fo difficult, as to make a fafe retrait. A fure Rule it is, that there 50 is leffe dishonour to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof Mr. dela Noue gives this judgement, of a daies retrait, made in France, presently before the battaile of Moncountour. For (faith he) fraying vpon our reputation, in shew not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day:

whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthic Gentleman 2 Count Lodowick of Nussua. Drother to the late famous prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moneountour with so great resolution, as hee said the one halfe of the Protessant Armie, then broken and dissanded, of which my solic was an eye witnesse; and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the fafe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turne their backs to the enemic, and their faces homeward. Amilius followes them, as near eas he can, without ingaging himelfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atthus the other Confull, with the Legions of Sardinis, lands at Pifa; so as the Gaules, inclosed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Reare, and front. To suffaine Amilius, they appoint the Gelfates, and the Malanois; in the Front, they range the Piemonois, and the test of the Gaules inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the sight Polybius defibeth at large: which was well soughtofall hands. But in the end the Gaules sell; and so did Atthus the Confull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Ameroeisus, with fortic thousand of their Vallalls.

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules loft courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were inuaded the yeare following this ouerthrow, by the new Confulls Fuluius, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vie their victorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeares time, to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Consults beat the Boij; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that raigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeare, Furius, and Flam. nius, inuade the Milanois; and prevaile very farre, being strongly affished by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Neuerthelesse these Consulls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to religne their Office: because the Augures, or Sooth Jayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all forts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not 30 only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this revocation, from the Senate, and being otherwiseaduertised of the contents, was not hastic to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countrie; then pervsed the letters; and returning home obtayined a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that hee fided in faction with the Commonalaic, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Countrie of the Senones among the people of Rome, the Roman the first, or one of the first, 40 that underflanding the Majestics of Rome to be indeptic whealy in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegacie, or grand Commission; did not sand highly von his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfee, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly elevemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side and found imitatours, that rose by the same arte; which in processe of time, grew the only or chiese way to preferment.

Flaminins and his Colleague, being deposed; McLaudius Marcelius, and Cn. Cornalius Scipio, were chosen Consulls, for the rest of that yeare. The Gaules about this time desired peace, and were like to have obtayned it: though the new Consulls 30 were against it, as searing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessaus, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and joyned with the Insulvins: all other discourse, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consulls hasted into their Province, where they besieged Acerre, a towne not farre from Xouro (so farre had the Romans pierced alreadie) in the Duchie of Milan. To divert them from this siege, Britomarus sate downe before Classidium, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend vpon the Consulls at Acerra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not fuffice, to make the Romans breake up their fiege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Confulls comming; and met him vpon the way : fo suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themfelues after their journie, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britemarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauerie, lost his game at a cast, He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot : but hee thought so well to of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking amy one to fight with him. Marcellus was no leffe daring, than the barbarous King; whether more wife in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that fufficed to commend him. He flue and difarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke fuch courage, and his enemies were fo difmajed, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman General flue the General of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Collus, and this Marcellus, had the honour; yet I dare fay, that the two Scipio's, and divers other Roman Captaines, especially Cafar, 20 were better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered up to IVPITER, Opima Spolia: The Armour of a Generall flaine by themseliues, when they were Generalls, nor perhaps affected to to doc.

After this victorie, Acerra was yeelded to the Romans; and Milan Soone after: with all that belonged to the Cifalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mightie Nation, that had for so many yeares vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territorie possest by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie, fo many as would not subject their necks to the Roman voke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselves in 30 the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Theeues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeares, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at fuch leifure, that they closed up the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) faue once, in the raigne of Numa; nor in long time after, vntill the raigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long: a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had ever beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchie as farre, as their ambition could res could reach:

10 Thewarres of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians. HANNIBAL besiegeth and taketh Saguntum; whilest the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

ANNIBAL, the some of Amilear, was about fixe and twentie yeares old, when hee was chosen Generall of (a) the Carthegunan forces in Spaine. Hee was elected by the Armic, as foone as A (drubal was dead : and the election was rathied by the flate at Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleafed. This was now the third of the Barehine familie (fo called of Amilear, whole furname was Bareas) that had Mi command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps have beene leffe enuied, by these domesticall enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and been theonly men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This generall goodwill, as it was first purchased by the most worthie deserts of Amilear, in fauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it 30 with treasures, and great reuenewes; so was it retained by the same good artes, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partifans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was unreproueable; nor to performe the like feruices vnto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselues, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous aduice, of not prouoking the Romans. This they Cafoned other whiles with detraction; faying, that the Birchine faction went about to oppresse the libertie of the Citic. But their malicious wordes were varegarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens, (very few excepted) no leffe Barchine, than Hannibil himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the ar-40 ticles of peace, affoorded no fecuritie to Carrhage; were shee never so quiet, and officious; vniesse she would veeld to become their Subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than untill the Romans could finde fome good advantage, to renew the Warre : it was rather defired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their owne state was in good case, the warre should beginne; than that in some vnhappie time of famine or peftilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon termes of difaduantage.

This disposition of his Countrimen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he 50 ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time denifed of this bufineffe) that in making warre with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armicinto Italie, without molefation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistants, even of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could never be offe.

Acd, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginism, how glad focuer they would be, to heare that he had fet the warre on foote, would neuerthelesse be flow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpole, but with fuch particulars as must be difcourfed of, in procuring allowance to his defligne. This might suffice to disorder the whole Proiect. Wherefore, he refolved to lay liege vnto Saguntum; which might feeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly pleafe the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignitie, of that Spanish Townes alliance with their 10 false friends. So should hee affaie both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having thus concluded, he nevertheleffe went faire and orderly to worke; and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approched vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (faith Liuie) to give fome colour to his proceedings: as it he had not principally intended the warre, against Saguntum, but had beene drawne thither by course of builnesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such to malities, it was needefull to finish the Conqueit of the rest, before he did any th ngthat should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territoric of the * Oleades; and having befieged Althas (Lime calleth it Cartein) their chiefe 20 Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Mafter not only thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he first vindertooke, being subdued, and the But in theold winter at hand; he rested his Armic in New Carthage, or Carthagens; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late conquest.

In the Spring following, he purfued the warre against the a Vaccai: and without any great difficultie, wanne first Saimantiea, now called Salamanea; and after it, & Arbacala, by affault: though not without along fiege, and great difficultie. But in his rearne, he was put to the heighth, both of his courage, and of his Martiall judgement. For all fuch of the Vaccai, as were able to beare armes, being made desperate by the spoile of their Countrie, with those of Salamanes, and of the Oleades, that 20 had escaped in the late over-throw, joyning themselves with the Tolerans, compounded an Armie of an hundred thouland able men; and flayed Harmbal on the bankes of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourne in Portugale. These foure Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that be neuer faw enemie, vpon whom hee durft not giue charge; were throughly refolued, that his naturall valour would at this time no leffe neglect the cold advice of differentian, than at other times it had feemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vieit. But hee that makes himseise a bodie of Crystall, that all men may looke through him, and differential the parts of his dispolition; makes himselse (withall) an Asse and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or 40 driue him. Wife men, though they have fingle hearts in all that is iust and vertuous; yet they are like coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this fubrile Ca thaginian, when he ferued under Afdrubal, was, of all the men of markein the Armie the most aduenturous. But that which may befeeme a Captayne, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath fometime facceeded well with fuch great ones, as haue beene found more fortunate, than wife. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diffemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himfelfefrom the River fide, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multi- se tude, from their bankes of aduantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such fort, as Hannihal delired that they should; thrust themselves in furic and disorder, into the fwift fir ame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie fide. But when Hannibal faw them in their way, and well-neare ouer; hee turned back his Elephants, to entertayne them at their landing : and thrust his Horse-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the River. These, carrying a kinde of Lance de gay, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the middelt of the staffe; had such an advantage ouer the foot, that were in the Riuer, under their strokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or shift their bodies, as on firme ground : that they slew all those, (in a manner) without relistance, which were alreadic entred into the water; and purfued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that fide the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift vp their handes against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiuing the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They fent Embassadours to Rome, and bemoned themselves, as likely to fuffer that, which afterwards they fuffered indeede; only because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was aireadic belieged. Hereupon some crie out, that Warre should bee proclaymed by Land and Sea; as alfothat the two Confuls should be fent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carryed it. So it was only concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state of 20 their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plaulible occasion to take armes against him : if hee had no such purpose; yet would it be in their power, to determine what they listed themselues, vpon the report of these Embassadours; and this their gravitie, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embasfadours Linie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of finceritie leffe questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagena; and had conference with him, though fuch as 30 left them doubtfull. This is more agreable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And furely wee might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Linie confesseth) and fail to disputation about the cournants of peace; if they had rejected that which was fent upon none other pretence, than preuention of warre.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani; a Nation adjoyning to Saguntum, and having many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly 40 among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himfelfe had hatched fome. Finding therefore such an occasion, what soeuer it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he medled with them; he made no more adoc, but fatedowne with his whole power before their Towne. Hee was now more fecure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertayned the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late yeares they had beene wont. Neuertheleffe, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions: not only because the warre, which he so much defired, was not proclaimed, but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemie, before hee could fet foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrarie defire. They were glad 10 of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hastie to threaten, before they were readie to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readinesseto be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seate of the

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that hee found himselfe ouerftreightly tyed vp by them, with hard conditions; or rather because hee was of an vnthankefull dilposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the same of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perills, euen with the hazard of his whole estate, which hee had received of their gift. But hee was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece: against the couenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further, and sei- 10 sed vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begunne fooner, or rather if he had staied somewhat longer, he might have sped better. For the bulinesse with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun: when he declared himselse, by his doings, an enemie, and was vanquished. The Roman Conful, Emilius, was fent against him : who in seuen daics wan the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought fuch terror vpon the Countrie round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citic of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to relift: which it might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebell had not been too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and be- 20 flowed them in couert; presenting himselfe the next morning, with twentie ships before the Towne, and offering to force the Hauen. Demetrius with all his power iffued out against the Conful; and was soone intercluded from the Towne, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths, to a creeke, where he had shipping readic for him, and embarqued himselfe : leaving all his estate vnto them, of whose liberalitie he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal fate downe, ere Amilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the fiege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue fallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dan- 30 gerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies vnable to moue. Neuerthelesse he was not unmindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raife certaine moueable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot affault was given: but it was fo well fustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and camp. Neuerthelesse the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an 40 hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so weariethe townesimen with continual trauaile, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the Citic, by some counter-workes of the Saguntines, that were also readie to be won. In this extremitic, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfeout of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuere, and without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, filuer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfeto be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that hee would affigne some other place for their habitation : not allowing them, to carrie out with 10 them any other thing, wherewith to fustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better have submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and faued the honor of their wives and daughters) daughters) than to hauerested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wines and daughters were defloured before their faces; and all put to sword, that were aboue fourteeney exerces of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and sell their bloud at the dearest rate, they shut themselues up like most were they had: to dying unreuenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hamnibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, he divided among his Souldiers; reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his softeness as a Carshage, and to animate them who to the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to because ie at their owne flownesse, in forbearing to fend helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe revenge. To this end they sent Embassadours againe to Carthage : demanding only, Whether it were by generall confent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that HANNIBAL had made warre upon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it feemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embaffage, how focuer qualified with milde words, was indeede more in folent than to the former. For in that, they only required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was veged to pleade guiltie, or not guiltie. But (faid the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spaine, in belieging Saguntum, have only followed his owne counfaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeede worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lawfull, or unlawfull, for HANNIBAL to doe as hee hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge vs, if wee have done any thing contrarie to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Luctatius the 30 Conful, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended : but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, betweene you and Adrubal, wherein you will fay that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught vs, how to answere that particular. For what focuer you found in the Treatie betweene vs and Luctatius, to your owne disaduantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promifing those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it bee lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Confuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the 40 fame libertie may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Adrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and confent.

This was an impertinent answere, and little better than a meere cauill. For Lutatium the Confull, in his Treatic of peace with the Carthaginians, had express year ferred the allowance thereof to the people of Roma. It had beene therefore much better, to have dealt plainely; and to have alleaged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the slie of Sardinia, and with all of twelve hundred talents: which perjuric the state of Carthage, being now growneable, would revenge with open 10 warre. As for the Sagantines; it little skilled that the Roman had admitted them into consideracie, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treatic of peace with Midwids! Seeing that the Treatic with Midwids!, and all other businesse between Roma and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Doedinia, were no better than Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Doedinia, were no better than Roman injuries.

what focuer wee require, elfe will wee make warre, without regard of our oath, which wee baue alrea lie broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Liuie himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the fpirit of Amilear with defire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this injurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulnesse, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long beene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinarie force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian 10 Senate moued the Roman Embassadours, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long deterinited against them : as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but then pretences. Wherupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if fomewhat had beene laid in the hollow thereof, made this fhort reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Mafters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euch which of them you your felfe haue a fancie to offer vs. Marrie then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre and share it among you. Which all the Affembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had refolued to make warre, it was meerely friuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, have ever been emaintayined by the partie vinwilling, or vinable to fulfaine the warre. The ruftie fword, and the emptie purfe, doe alwaies pleade performance of couenants. There have beene few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwisevnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne advantage : and commonly (feeing peace between ambitious Princes, and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best-aduised haue rather begunne with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henrie the second, of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Brifac, to surprise as ma- 20 ny places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip the fecond, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, belides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilear, at what time he did facrifice, being readie to take his journie into Spaine, had folemnely bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischiese, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeares old, when his father caufed him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make 40 this vow: fo that it was no meruaile, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this fort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom wee are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predeceffors, that as foone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselues enemies to the people of England.

HANNIBAL takes order for the defence of Spaine and Africk. His iournie into Italie.

Arre being thus proclaymed, Hannibal resolued, not to put vp his fword, which hee had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill hee had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the fecond Punick Warre; fecond to none, that ever the Senate and People of Rome sustained. Hannihal wintred at Carthagena; where he licenced his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother A/drubal, for the gopernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troupes of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that fo the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africa thirteen thousand, eight hundred, and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horie; also eight hundred flingers of the * Baleares. Belides these, he selected foure theusand foet, all youngmen, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrifond Minner. 20 in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostiges: for among those fourethousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their scuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftic and seuen Gallies; whereof thirtie feuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him about twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twentie Elephants.

Having in this fort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he sent Discoursers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenean Mountaines, and of the allees. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gaules, 30 to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armic entire into Italie, and not becompelled to diminish his forces, by any warrein the way, till heecame to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors, and Discouerers, being returned with good fuisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past over the River of Iberus, with an Armic confilling of fourescore and ten thousand soot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued; and appointed Hanno (not that old enemic of his house, who sate fill at Carthege) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of therus; to whom he left an Armic of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine. fome of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leaue; which that o-40 thers might not also doe, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journie seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With therest of his armic, confissing now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand fand horse, he past the Pyrenees and entred into Gaule. He found the Gaules that bordered vpon Spaine, readie in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, heecame to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each fide of the River, a people called Volca. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to 30 keepe him from paffing ouer the water. But he was greatly affilled by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vuaretz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrie of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet fuch as remained, being desirous to free their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Countrimen beaten, which had abandoned them. than to have their owne store of corne and cattaile wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the River; and lent him guides. When the veffells for transportation of his Armie were in readinesses he fent Hanne, the fonne of Bomilear, vp the River : himfelfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foorde below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vnawares upon their owne fide, and Hannibal, at the fame time, passing the River in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with fome difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in con- to ucying ouer his Elephants; who meruailously feared the water. He was therefore driven to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another, of the fame fort, but loofe, vpon which the beafts were towed ouer.

Hauing past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cifalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. Theseinformed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which not with standing; hee found himselfe extremely incumbred by 20 the Savoians: and loft, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely affailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other fide. And whereas this journie ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trauaile, he was euery day, more or leffe, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grieuous weather and fnow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now readie to receive them; with the affiftance and conduct of the Cifalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often inuaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on: having no- 30 thing else of difficultie remayning, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and refolution; namely the Roman Armies, and reliftance.

ð. III.

How the Romans in vaine (olicited the Spaniards and Gaules totake their part. The rebellion of the Cifalpine Gaules against the

He Countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene follicited peroie, by the mane Embaffadours, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. The case a cooke Spaine in their way home they were inftructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way home-ward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to disswade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volleians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open affembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answere. With what face (faith 50 he) can yee Romans perswade vs to valew your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wife, than fo? For they, relying on your faith, and promifed affiftance, have beene vtterly rooted out, and defiroied by the Carthaginians; whom they might elfe haue held their affured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spaine have found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answere for the rest of our Countrimen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our handes: who are resoluted, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitic. From the Volcians, the Embassadours tooke their way towards the Gaules; vsing their best arguments to perswade them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying themselues, their firength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to Icorne, and had hard-

10 ly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by relisting Hannibals passage into Halie, entertaine a warre which is not meant to be made against vs? Shall we hold the warre among our felues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedie pace from vs, towards our ancient enemics? Haue the Romans described so well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that wee should fet fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning ? No, weeknow it well, that the Romans haue alreadic forced fome Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselues, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

20 With this vnpleafing answere the Embassadours returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemie. Of this inclination, the cifalpine Gaules gaue haltic proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had passed therus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boij, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian fuccour, which they supposed to benow at hand; they laid atide all regard of those hostages, which they had given 30 to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it feemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal (hortly afterfailed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrie) to flie to Modena: where they belieged them. The fiege of Modens had continued fome small time; when the Gaules, having little skill in affaulting Cities, waxed wearie, and feemed defirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their Hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detayned. Atanlian the 40 Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the reliefe of the belieged. But the Grules, having laid a strong ambush inawood ioyning to the way, fel vpon the Prætor 10 opportunely, as he was veterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recouered, by fast running, a little village, but defencible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was haltily fent, to relieue the belieged, with one Legion, and five thouland of the Roman affociates : which forces were taken out of the Confuls Armie, and supplied by a new leuie

As the Gaules were too rash and hastie : so were the Romans too slow, and indeede too ill-aduised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that 50 Carthage, which had almost seruilely endured so many indignities in time of the late peace; would be so braue and couragious on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italie it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africk: refling secure of all danger at home. Titus Semprenius tooke his way toward Africk, with an hundred and threescore Quinquerenies, or Gallies, of flue to an Oare; which preparation may feeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neare. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Conful, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Prouence; and vsed such diligence. hauing the winde also fauourable, as in fine dayes he recoursed Massilia. There hee was aductifed, of Hannibal his having paffed the River of Rhodanus; whom hee thought to haue found busie yet awhile in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arrivall: whereof he was neither glad, nor forrie; as not meaning to have to doe with him. Each of them fent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were to beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, having flaine only two hundred. and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when scipio drew neare, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found affuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome, This interrupted his intended voiage into Spaine. Neuertheleffe hee fent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armie, to trie what might bee done against Afdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Scato Pifa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troupes of Manlius and Atilius, that lately had beene beaten by the 20 Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemie, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull journie.

Scipio the Roman Conful over-come by HANNIBAL at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Confuls beaten by HANNIBAL, in a great battaile at Trebia.

Jue moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious journic from Carthage. na; what great muster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twentie thousand; others report them to have been only twentie thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himfelfe, in his Monument which he raifed, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the bankes of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirtie thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all saue those remembred by himselsein as the Inferiorion of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to have perished, by diseases, enemies, Rivers, and Mountaynes; which mischiefes had devoured, each, their seucrall shares.

Hauing newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armiein the Countrie of Piemont; he sought to winne the friendship of the a Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Infubrians, which were his good friends, and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he affaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three dayes. Their spoile ferued well to hearten his Armic; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoe, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many so for good-wil, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Conful his arrivall, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters ; what man Conful was already gotten through the most defencible pallages, creany speech had beene heard of his approch : many fate still, for very feare, who else would faine haue concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their feruice against the Carthaginians, whom neverthelesse they will ed

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals hatten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Paula; where each of them wondred at the others great expedition: Hanni-10 bal thinking it strange, that the Conful, whom he had left behinde him on the other fide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himfelie in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountaynes, and the great spirit of his Enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed, at Hannibals successe, and sudden arrivall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all hafte vnto Sempronius, the other Conful, that was then in Siedla , guing him to understand hercof; and letting him further know, that whereas he had beene direare the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that hee should forbeare to profecute any such attempt, but that hee should returne the Armie under his charge, with all possible speede, to saue Italie it selfe. According to this order, Sem-20 prontus fent off his Fleet from Lilybeum; with direction to land the Armie at Arminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rauenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making hatte. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come fo neare, that fight they must, ere they could part afunder. Hercupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the belt arguments they had : voto which Hannibil added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he showed upon certaine prifoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italie. For these, having beene no lesse miserably settered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their defire, than to be deliuered from their miferies by any kinde of prefent 30 death; were brought into the middle of the Armie; where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companion. till the one of them were flaine; with condition, being the Vister, to receive his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chiefraines of the Guies were wont to vie in fingle combats. Enery one of these vnhappie men wished, that his owne lot might speede; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miscries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, who fe good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutedly : as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having 40 none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally for all these poore creatures were willing, upon what socuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselves out of ilauerie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them; wrought also vpon the Circhaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordayned. For they deemed happic, not only him, that by winning the victoric had gotten his libertie, together with an horse and armour: but even him also, who being slaine in fight had escaped that miferable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them; beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect. That he had laid before 50 them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetual flauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common fence, could promife to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Ri432

Scipio, on the other tide, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge ouer the Rauer of Ticinus, did not neglect to vie the best arguments and reasons hee could, to encourage the Armie heled; putting thom in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Anceitors; against how many Nations they had premailed; and oner how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armic commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no 20 better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theenes, than an Armie like to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and harued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustayne the first charge that should be given vpon them. Nay (faid he) yee your selucs may make sudgement what daring they have now remayning, after so many transiles and miseries; feeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal himselfe, tearing our approch, ranne head long towards 20 the Alpes: thinking it a leffe diffionour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the tharpe fwordes of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa and in Sicil.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met: each being farre advanced before the groffe of his Armic, with his Horfe; and the Roman having also with him fomelight armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discourred the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to beginne the right, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground bet veene their troupes, to affilt them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, following foftly in good order. The Gaules (whether defirous to trie the mettall of the so Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselues couragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shranke at the first brunt, or rather sled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This not with standing the Gaules maintayned the fight, and did more burt than they received as prefuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Conful vnmindfull to relieue them : their hardinesse deseruing his aide; and the hastie slight of those that should have flood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee adventured himfelfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: 10 though others give the honour of this refeue, to a Ligurian flave. Whilest the Romans were busted in helping their Conful; an vnexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hunnibat had appointed his Numidian light horse, to give vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compaffe them about, whileft he with his men at armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well : cutting in peeces the feattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and rowted : so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

CHAP.3. S.4. of the Historie of the World.

When Scipio faw his horse thus beaten and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of wiledome, having lost so many of his Fleet you the first puffe of winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the to tempelt ouer-tooke him. For he law by the lowring morning, what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, hee in a manner ftole the retrait; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But not with standing all the baste that he made, heeleft fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him, who were the last that should have passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of warre, Steertamen quandog, dubium videatur, taquam miles arripiat fugam : fuga enim aliquando laudanda : which must be understood in this fort; If a Generall of an Armie, by some unprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or findethis Armie fewefull or wavering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retrain, than to abide the uncertaine event of battaile.

10 It was two dayes after, ere Hannibal could paffe the River; Scipio the whileft refreshing his men, and casing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their campe; the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare courage to for fake him. They thought that now the long-defired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Aneroeffus, Britomarus, and the Gellates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman campe; wounded and flew many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Car-20 thiginians, and prefented their fernice. Hannibal received them exceeding courteoully, and difmift them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vie to him, in perfwading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other feruice at the prefent.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Conful stale a retrait, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, fent the N umidians after him: following himfelfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedie of spoile, had not staid to ransack their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, faue some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the River 40 of Trebia, and faue themselves. Scipio, being both vnable to travaile by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Conful; incampes himfelfe firongly vpon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitier equired that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day, more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian fide; among whom came in the Boy, that brought with them the Roman Comillioners, which they had taken in the late Infurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages : but now they deliuer them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcitie of victuailes, 50 attempted the taking of Clastidium, a Towne wherein the Romans bad laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, fold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, ra-00000

ther with a defire of hastic reuenge, than any great forrow for their loss received, seeing that, in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sieil, awaited his comming. He therefore hasted thirther; and from thence he marched speedly towards his Colleague: who attended him you the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls deuised about that which remained to bee done: Sempronius receiving from Seipio the relation of what had passed also also arrivals; the fortune of the late fight; and by what errour or misaluenture the Romms were therein foiled: which Seipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treasons to Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; fought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recoursed of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victorie, which he had alreadie, in his imagination, certainely obtayned. He also feared the election of the new Confuls: his owne time being well-neare expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrarie; objecting the vnskilfulnesse of the new-come Souldiers : and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him, that the Gaules, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting betweene the Rivers of Trebis, and Po, being alreadic revolted. 20 Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made hafte to finde out the dishonour, which he might otherwise eafily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal, who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, confishing in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules inhabiting neare vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that 20 they might have done; although hee daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their fakes, and to let them at libertie, hee had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his wordes, he was bold to be his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flie to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, fay that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this : he suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it flood with the honour of Rome, to preserve the Confederates from suffering injurie: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent out a thousand horse: which com- 40 ming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavie loaden, cut many of them in pecces, and chaced the reft euen into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallic out against them : who caused them to retire fafter than they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men; and repelled the cremies. Hannibai did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in generall desirous to trie the maine chance in open field: all the persuasions of Stapio to the contrarie notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hamilas was advertised by so the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himfelie how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces. He found in the hollow of a water-course, ouer-growne with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. Thereinto he cast his brother Mago, with a thousand choice horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed. and well fed themselves, in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Conful. Early in the morning, he had fent ouer Trebia form companies of Aumidian light horse: to braue the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was readie to take any opportunitie to fight; and therefore not only iffued out of his campe, but foorded the River of Trebia, in 2 most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes; which, together with the want of foode, did so enjecble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armesthey bare, Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines : having of the one, fixteene, of the other, twentiethouland. The maffe of these they ranged in a groffe Battalion, guarded on the flankes with three thousand horse; thrusting their light named, and Daugers, in local troups in the head of the reft, in the nature of a Wantguard. The Carthaginian nombers of foot, were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse, When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flankes of their foor were broken by the Numidians; when their foor were charged both in front and flanke, bythe Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares preft in the Reare, by Mage and his two 20 thouland, that role out of their place of ambulh: then fell the Romans, by heapes. under the enemies fwordes; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in diforder, as flying towards the River, by the harle-men that purfued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all forts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which energy one deserved to be recompensed with the losses that followed. The first was, that hee sought with Hamibal in a Champaine, being by fare inferiour in horse, and wichall thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-even grounds, and woodlands, would hause beene of noy like. His second errour was, that he made no discover of the place vpon which he sought; whereby he was großly ouer-reacht, and instared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drench his soot men with emptic stomachs, in the Riuer of Trebia, even in a most cold and frostic day, whereby in effect they lost the vise of their limbs. For as one sint well; There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to present an Armie, the generosities of minde is but as an varprossibally vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Plaentia; Itealing away the fame night, which was exceeding raynie, from the Carthaginian; who either perceiued him not, because of the shewers; or 40 would not perceiue him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius cleaped with extreme danger; shying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies borle. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a fecret slight; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance; if the enemie had met with him. Neuertheless hee goraway, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeare following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hamnial.

The departure of HANNIBAL from the Cifalpine Gaules into Hetruria. FLAMINIVS the Roman Conful Staine; and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

He Winter growing on apace, was very tharpe, and vnfit for feruice:

to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keep 10 the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremons. Yet Hannibal did not fuffer them to reft very quiet : but vexed them with continuall alarmes; affayling diners places; taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Ligurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Quæltors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such Prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loden with yrons, and miserably sed: those of their followers hee not only well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That he therefore vndertooke the Warre in Italie, to free them from the 20 oppression of the Romans. By these meanes hee hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and affistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such perswalions: They stood in scare, lest hee should make their Countrie the scate of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more gricued than feafon willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the advice, were readie soone after to practise against him; but were in like fort detected. He was therefore glad to vie Perwigs of haire, and false beards of divers colours, to the end that he might not be described, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Faine hee would have passed 30 the Apennines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till hee had seene more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolued to take his leave of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, having his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more seruiceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Apennine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet fince the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was transiling through and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the 40 extremitie of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that journie. Neuertheleffe to avoid the length of way, together with the relistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have beene erected upon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes; by the moistnesse of the aire, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recourred the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where hee somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the 50 Roman Confuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Seruilius had of late beene chosen Consuls for this yeare: Seruilius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who basing once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Confullhip, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be ferued fo againe, vnleffe hee quickly finished the warrei. This jealous Conful thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, left his advertagies, by fayning fome religious impediments, should detaine him within the Citie or finde other bufinesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed ferretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, remoked him by Embassadors : but to he neglected their injunction; and halting to meet with the Carthaeinians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them. The fierie disposition of this Consplictormised vnto Hannibal great affurance of victoric. Therefore he pronoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman : hoping thereby to draw him vato fight, ere Servieus came with the reft of the Armie. All the Countrie betweene Fefula and Arretiam , hee put to fire and fword, even ynder the Confuls note; which was enough to make him flirre; that would not have fitten full schough diametal had been quiet. It is true, that agreat Captayne of France hathfaid ; Pays gallen'effe par perder; A maffed Countrie is dot thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Plantuins thought his owne honour 20 to be much impaired a and therefore advanced towards the Enemies Many advifed him (which had indeede beene best) to have parsence awhile; and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to heare having, that he came not roidefend Arretium, whilest the Cartheginian went, burning downe all state before them, to the gates of Rome of Therefore he tooke harles and commanded the Armicto march. It is reported as ominous that one of their Entignes fluck to fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Enligne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or falle, Tullie makes a jeast : faying, that the dowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardily pitched it into the earths. Neither was the answere of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable heroto. For he commanded, that 20 it should be digged up, if feare had made the hands too weake to life it; asking with all; whether letters were not come from the Senato; so hinder his proceedings. Of this jealousie, both hee, and the Senate that gone him cause likely to a a libe of the my improvement and high province...

All the Territoric of Cartona, as faure as to the Lake of Thrafymene, was on a light fire; which whileft the Conful thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he purfued Hannibal fo vnaduifedly, that he fell, with his whole Armic ainto an ambush cunningly laid for him, betweene the Mountaines of Gartons, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all fides, (fauconly where that great Lake of Perulia, permitted neither his enemies to come at him; not him to flie from them) knowing 40 not which way to turne, or make refulance. So was bee flaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thou fand dead sarkaffes of his Countrimen 11 About fixe thoufand of his men, that had she Vantguard, tooke courses as for the most part happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recouered the tops of the Mountaines. If the fe had returned, and given charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. Burthat violence of their feare, which, kindled by necessition had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well asswaged, when they cealed to despaire, of fauing their lines by flight. They food still in a cold fweat, upon the Hill-top; hearing under them a terrible noise, but not discoso uering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all the morning.

When it grew toward noone, the nive was cleared, and they might pluinly distorte the lamentable flaughter of their fellowes. But they flaid not to lament it for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were descried; and attached by adaka kin intelesional giological kina seria in a seria

the enemies horse. This they should have thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For descried they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a village, which hee furrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendring their armes, vpon his promise of their lives and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; faying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith : and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they lifted; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, 10 besides their first bargaine; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and beelimited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans. whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his handes : of which all that were not Romans, he fet free without ransome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their fakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in fireight prifon, and in fetters; making them learne to eate hard meat. This was a good way, to 20 breede in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome : as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preserving of her owne neck from the yoke of flauerie, which her ouer-firong enemies would thrust vpon her, in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by fuccesse of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partifans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neare vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Servilius the other Gonful, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but comming too late, he increased only the misaduenture. Maharbal was imployed by Hannibal, 30 to intercept this companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouenthrow, charged them, and brake them; and killing almost halfe of them, draue the whom on high peece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Servilius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules 3 against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the es were brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; and made him haften back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular jealousie, which perfwaded the Romans to the yearclie change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all 40 men are farre better raught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-poers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had been etaken but the yeare before, by this subtile Carthaginian; yet suffered he himselfe to be caught soon after in the same manner. He had also belike forgotten, how Semprenius, fearing to be prevented by a new Conful, and ambitious of the lole honour of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with shame and losse: else would be not, contrarie to all good aduice, have been so hastie to fight, before the arrivall of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the fecond time, and have fearched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: 30 both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten yeares, Cafar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene energy years a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, have beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeares compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helpes, whereby to profecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeares; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wife, as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they beganne but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Gouernement, fitting the Countrie, they have beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But to it hath ever beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their flothful ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have perswaded the imitation.

ò. V I.

How Q. FABIVS the Roman Dictator, Sought to consume the force of HANNIBAL, by lingring warre. MINVTIVS, the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successefull attempting, adventures rashly up. on HANNIBAL; and whike to perish with his Armie, but refcued by FABIVS.

Reatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than euer did warre, fince Rome it felfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow; that when Pyrrhushad beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all

Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that 20 could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded upon hate; hee only fought honour, and fought (asit were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himfelfe like a courteous enemie. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, wirneffed his purpose, and his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long beene out of vie, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto comptroll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Confuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were for that the Conful (if he flood vpon his 40 prerogatiue) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooke vpon them, as having supreme authoritie, to give the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warrein the Citie. Novum factum, novum consilium expetit; Contrarie windes, contrarie courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion : a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. Butifit were true (as Liniereports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and Lin. 1, 24-30 gaue direction in this businesse of denotion; then must we believe, that those books of Sybil, preserved in Rome, were distated by an euill spirit. For it was ordayned, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warreto Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other fuch trumperie. This vehemencie of superfittion, proceedes alwaies from vehemencie of seare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly diffempered with passion : whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their fonnes returne aliue from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witnesse; though it bee more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the Citie, were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe: and all care taken , for defence of Rome it felfe. In this tumult , when the Dictator was newly fet forth against Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilius the Conful to put to Sea; and taking vp 10 all the ships about Rome, and Ostia, to pursue them : whilest he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had levied in halte: and from Ariminum he received the Armie, which Servilius the Conful had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannihal in the meane while, purfuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrie, and vfed all manner of crueltic towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the fword, all the were able to beare armes. Paffing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his dif- 20 eased, and ouer-transiled Companies; armed bis Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Hauing refreshed his Armie; sed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it ) healed his horse heeles of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine : he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrueini, and all other Nationslying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: cally he had affaied Spoletum, a Colonic of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer.

The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poictiers, a little before the battaile of Moncounter; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at St. lean d'Angeley. But Hannibal was more wife. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detayne him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Malter of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of batterie. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as foone as he faw him; and prouoked him with all manner of bravado's. But Fabins would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betweene Souldiers bred vp, euer 40 fince they were Boics, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no oftner seene the enemie, than been vanquished by him. Therefore hee attended the Carthaginian so neare, as hee kept him from stragling too farre; and preserved the countrie from vtter spoile. He invred his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might sit

Now Minutius had a contrarie disposition, and was as fierie as Flaminius; taxing Fabins with cowardife and feare. But all stirred not this well-adused Commander. 10 For wife men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indifcretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune : It wasteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that defires battaile; and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and the victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apenines, and to fall vpon the most rich and pleasant Territoric of Campania; neither could be by any arguments be perfwaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile : but being farre too weake in horse, he alwayes kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no meanes draw this warie Dictator to fight; that the Winter came on; and that the towns flood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though a-farre off; he resolved to rest his Armie, that was loaden with spoile, in some plentifull and affured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Calli-10 cula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which hee might iffue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which hee had alreadie wafted, into places more aboundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would have beene directed vnto Casinam, whence he might both affay the faire Citic of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under hand, and hinder the Romans from coming theare it to preuent him. But his guide mif-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry an other way, from Cassinum to Cassinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now beganne the wildome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and wonne the victorie, without blowes. But 20 Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himfelfe; by a flight invention, yet ferning the turne as well as a better. In driving the countrie, he had gotten about two thouland Kine; whose hornes he dreffed with drie faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be the worke of a terrible enemie. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a device to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hilltops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fieric Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ranne therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leffe afraid 20 of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recourred fure ground, without molestation: where he stayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with fome flaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmifle After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journie towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the Citic, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, for faken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barnes and Store houses for winter, and incamped under the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time paffed idlely, till the Distator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the 40 Armie in charge with Minutius, the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiencie. Hee was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this jollitie of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee 50 held vindoubtedly his owne; the loue of the Armie; and the friends that he had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to faue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer fo hainoufly. Hannibal on the other fide was no leffe glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore heedrew neare : and to prouoke the Romans, fent forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minitius incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that he now despited those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two camps; which because it would bee commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minitius, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The fift Booke of the first part

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Sommer: if besides this he 10 could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This advantage Minutius wifely closed, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and fetting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed over all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no refistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans 20 tooke heart to affaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meere weakeneffe, which held him within his campe, and therfore were bold to despise his great name, that could not relift their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Afdrubal came from Geryon with foure thouland men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to iffue forth against the Romans; to whom neuerthelesse hee did not such hurt, as hee had received.

For this pecce of service Minntins was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he lent the newes, with somewhat greater boust than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recoursed 30 spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euery man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done any thing wifely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angric with the breach of discipline; and scarefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. Hee said that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he 40 were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie: for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other, taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons enery one cryed out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he lift, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (faid he) that this our only Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to bee wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himfelfecan, or dares? It were good to confider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee hath not chosen any new Conful all this 50 while; Seruilius is fent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indecde forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuic and suspition) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would have the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and have the fole Government both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltic of Rome, which gave him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthice. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him injurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour; I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equal authoritic, with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor less enecisive, than was the electing of this Dictator; by the People.

Though all men, cuen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible nor feeming beneficial at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was leffe than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authoritie, besides the Propounder, should stand up, and formally deligits his approparion; not one of the principall Citizens was found fo impudent, as tojoffer that open differen, both vnto a worthic Personage, and (therewithall) varo that Dignitic, whose great power had freed the State at feuerall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the yeare before had beene Prætor, was glad of fuch an opportu-20 nitie, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the fonne of a Burcher; afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew. by often brablings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very basenesse. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to give an hard puff at the Confulthip; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fapouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inucctive, not only against Fabjus, but against all the Nobilitie; faying, that it grieued them to fee the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them , in matter of Gouernement; that they foughtto 30 humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impourrish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne dores, which would foone confume every poore mans lining, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bad them to be wife : and fince they had found one, ( this worthie Master of the horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrie, to reward him according to his good deferts; and give him authoritie, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begunne. So the Act paffed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Conful, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and having 40 finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not beeable to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Ostinutius his aduancement, was at the campe as foone as Fabius : fo that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as a Companion; afking him at the first, in what fort he thought it best to divide their authoritic; whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successively, for fome longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equal to the Dictator; but that he should neuer be his superiour: He would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutian was not herewith greatly plea-30 fed; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke fuch wonders, as otherwische hoped to accomplish. Neuerthelesse hee meant to doe his best; and sotaking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Liuie seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doc. For where two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor joy-ned in Commission, but haue each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers. there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two diffinct Armies in which regard, one campe shall not hold them both, without great incommenience. Polybins mather findes fault with this disunction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vinwilling to command in chiefe fuccefficely (as the two Confuls vied) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee faith that Minutius was very retractarie: and fo proud of his advancement, that continually hee opposed the Lictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces betweene them, as is faid before, or else to have command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loofe from the 10 rigour of authoritic, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein confilted

It behould the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no leffe carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countrie lying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many, and spatious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed fine hundred horse, and flue thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not 20 be discouered. But lest by any miaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes, he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a pecce of ground, that lay on the other hand : whereby he drew the cies and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutins, to aductive vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like fort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest 30 the Romans defended themselves, looling many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neare, invery good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiuing a farre off, into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrie, than the differece which he had wrongfully fustained, fought rather to approue himselse, by hasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemie to seele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approch, Hannibal retyred; fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee confessed his life to have beene faued. So from this time forwards, the 40 Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whileft his Office lafled, which was not long, and likewife afterwards, when hee delinered vp his charge vnto the Confuls, that followed his instructions.

Seruilius the Conful had purfued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which hee came neuer within kenning. He ranne along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficans; passed over into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countrie, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the losse of 2 thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all hafte, hee returned home by Sieil., and (being for equired by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Conful, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

ò. V I I.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warrequickly, choose a rash and unworthing Consul. Great forces leuied against HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Canna. The new Confuls fet forth against HANNIBAL.

Ith little pleasure did they of the poorer fort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were given to Fabius by the principall Citizens.

He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow: but hee had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparance thereto tending. Rather it might feeme, that the reputation of this his one worthic act, was likely to countenance the flow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Elfe, what meant the Confus to fit idle the whole winter, contrarie to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall, had willingly fuffered the time of his command to runne away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were readic every man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his owne no private loffe, vpon the ill administration of the publique.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentize Varro, in his fuit for the Confullhip. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot : his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignitie. But the Comonaltie were then in fuch a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinfman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the libertic of his place, in faying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modestic. This bold Orator fluck not to affirme, That Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been over-20 throwne, and was releved by Fabius with the other two: but had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when he comanded ouer all, as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Conful, the warre would never be brought to an end; That fuch of the Plebeians, as had long fince been aduanced to honor by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemped the meaner fort, euer fince themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Conful, who should bee altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the People's love, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well descruing of them. By fuch perswasions, the Multitude was wonne, to be wholly for Terentius: to 40 the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honor; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the defire of the People, it fellout, or at least was alleaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Eiection. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe depoted; either (as was pretended) for fome religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Confuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vie at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted 50 themselues into Tens, or Decuries; and governed successively, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order : yet fo, that the Lietors, or Virgers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only upon the chiefe of them with thefe Enfignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Confuls; and put in vie, when by death, or any cafualtie, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The aduantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would have it, there needed no more, than to let flip fine daies, and then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well affwaged. Vpon fuch change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to fue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publiquely declare themselves to feeke those Offices. But no device would serve, against the generall favour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this meane, but worthic man, seemed so manifest, 10 that when the People had viged the businesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chofen Conful: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Herevpon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinarie marke had flood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and bot-headed man, one of great fufficiencie, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Amilius Paulus, he who few yeares fince had ouer-come the Illyrians, and chaced Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was viged by the Nobilitie to fland for the place; which he eafily obtained having no Competitor. It was not the defire of this honorable man, to trouble himfelfe any more in fuch great bufi- 22 neffe of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service; He, and M. Livius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto judgement: wherin Linius was condemned, and Amilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in minde. each of them in his fecond Confulthip, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most gricuous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happic victorie, that euer befell that Common-wealth.

The fift Booke of the first part

These new Confuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence, in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders hee would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to haue a 30 fight of Hannibal, whom he promifed to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, travailed more carneftly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainely boafted. He wrote vnto the two old Confuls Seruilius and Atilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheleffe, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leaving, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemie, and the Enemie well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate affisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the flanders, with which Terentius and his Adhe- 49 rents had burdened them. What number of men they raifed it is vncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and sixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly defired, of looking vpon Hannibal

Hiere, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were diffrested by their owne Mercinaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Stingers, with great quantitie of Whear, Barlie, and other prouisions: searing nothing more, than that one of the set would relieve the still search whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood yright, by hauing them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gaue them also counsalist for send to forces into Aspica; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might divert the warre from home. His gifts, and good advice were louingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titue Ostacilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sieil, that hee should accordingly passe over into Aspick, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more ferue to declare their puissance, than any, though larger, accompt by Poll, of such as were not eafily drawne into the field, and fitted for feruice. For besides these Armies of the Confuls, and that which went into Steel; twentie five thousand, with L. Pojibumius Albinus another of the Prætors, went against the Gaules, to reclaime that Prouince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They fent Embassadors to Philip the Jonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon; requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who having beene their 10 subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illgrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of paiment was alreadic past. What answere they received, it is not knowne: only this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not fent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth beganne to have an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifts that they were driven some after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little seener) would have beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauill about forfeiture for non paiment of the whole.

mind, as poffibly they could, without incurring the necessitie of a battaile. Many to skirmilhes they had with him; wherein their fucers[6, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemiss the honour of their other struices, but was indeede the occasson, to draw on the miscric following. Himmed, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neare him, lodged about Cinnussian, and, that they might not be driven to turneaside for all necessary, to the lost of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Cassle of Cannet for the towne was razed the yeare before. This place Hamibal wanne; and thereby not only sursished himsels, but compelled his semies to want many needfull thinges, vales they would be troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, see enabled himsels to abide in that open Countrie, fit for the service of his horse longer than the Romans, shaving so many mouthes to feede, could well endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Neuertheleffe, answere was returned vinto Servalius, that hee should have patience yet awhile: for that the Confuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as neede required.

Seruilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand, how this Peece, taken only indealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious follic of his fellow-Conful. The answere of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the Multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrie: but if he law his best were likely to beill taken, Hee would thinke it lesse rashnesse to aduenture vpon the Enemies fword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

Q. VIII.

Diffen sion betweene the two Roman Confuls. Whether it be likely, that HANNIZAL was upon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans preffed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

Helenew Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismissed M. Atilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenes: Seruilius they retained with them, as their Affiltant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessarie, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good wordes; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not only now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their owne great numbers; which were no 20 leffe than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrie Rood; how the state and safetie thereof, rested vpon their hands, vling some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectuall part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Armie, had not yet obtained one vistorie by plaine force and valour : but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconfiderate rafineffe of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one faw not his enemies, vntill hee was forrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkenesse whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, de- 30 claring what advantages they had against the Enemie; and how destitute the Enemie vvas of those helps, by vvhich he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their boft. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Æmilius vvas knowne to bee, they should easily prevaile against the Carthaginians: that came farre short of them in all things else, faue craft; which would not alwaies thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire, that they should have heart to fight; nor that they should loofe the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, 40 having preconceived a victorie, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby fought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affe-Eted with the Vulgar desire, of ending the year quickly; wherein since Amilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them for bear to vieit? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Conful Terentius; vvho vvas no leffe popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citic. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than vyben the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to bee freed from the doubtfull Passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, vvho hastned their desire 50 to effect, was likely to winne more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in the performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to have the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diffension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Emilius would fo too, but faid that it was not yet time; why? because the enemie must shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last yeares provisions, returne into Campaniato gather a second Haruest? This would (said Parre) sauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth sauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their decdes were like their wordes: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably enery day. Amilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to fend them away 10 in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and befeeching him to stay. Neuerthelesse he sate downe close by Hannibal: who as an unbidden guest gaue him but a rude well come and intertainement. The Carthaginian Horse, and light Armature, sell vpon the Roman Vantcourrers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whileft it was yet in march : but they were beaten off, not without loffe, for that the Romans had, among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Amilius, who could not handfomly withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped upon the River Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces over the wa-20 ter, to lie vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselues. Hee neuer was more viwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his enemie; with whom hee meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselse; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necesfaries: whereof an Armie forraging the countrie, was not likely to carrie about with it sufficient quantitie, for any long time. Here it would not bee passed ouer with silence, That Line differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the miscrie into which Han-20 nibal had beene driven; and of base courses that he denised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. He had (faith Liuie) but ten daies prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruly Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that He knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readic to for sake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to have stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length, for lack of all other counsaile, Heerefolued to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts 40 of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficuitie in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilest he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they cuen forced him vnto that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open champaine ground : wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Liuie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to fay, That, without their owne great folly, they had done paffaith; HANNIBAL de fuga in Galliam [dicitur] agitaffe; HANNIBAL [is faid] to have bethought himselfe of flying into Gaule : where he makes it no more than a matter 30 of heare-fay; as perhaps was all the reft of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe, itis very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victuailes enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armic, the Sommer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great haruest; since ing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he

he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions ? Suteable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattaile; his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Countrie, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoile: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemie; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not casie to doe the like. In this point therefore, wee are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who give it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwaies kept his Armie free from sedition, 10 though it were composed of fundrie Nations, no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe. hauing not only pronounced, That which of his men socuer fought brauely with an Enemie, was thereby a Carthaginian; but folemnely protested and sworne, (befides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should descrue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a senslesse deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrie and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should hee now doe there with his horse? or how could hee bee trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to line; having betraied all his Armie; and relinquished his 20 miscrable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Liuie. But of this and the like it is enough to fay, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne Countrimen; and where a loffe cannot be diffembled, nor the honor of the victorie taken from the Enemie, and given vnto blinde Fortune, thereto lay all the blame on some strange misgouernement of their owne forces: as if they might easily have wonne all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemie can hope to finde in them another time.

The fift Booke of the first part

Now let vs returne back to the two Armics, where they lie incamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good 20 his word vnto the people of Rome : and fince he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the confent of Paulus, now at length to vie his owne authoritie; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owneday came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he beganne to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to have diffwaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrie to a needleffe hazard. Against whose wordes and substantial arguments, Terentius could alleage none other, than point of honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians ouer the River but even the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that 40 were fetching water to the leffer Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to affaile: must this also be suffered? Hee would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of fuch courage, as promifed affured vi-Storie. When Amilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, oppolitevnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leave behinde him some answerable number, for desence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucitie he was leffe able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vponthe Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe fuch accidents) terrific and diffract the Enemies in the heat of fight. This done; the two Confuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the leffer Campe, whence whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile; the ground on the East part of the River, feeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, paffed likewife ouer, fomewhat higher up the streame, which range from the South; leaving in his owne campe fo many, as he thought would ferue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He bad them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did fo. And could you (faid he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyne battaile with the Romans upon fuch alcuell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to preuaile? They all affented to to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (faid he further) ye are first of all to thanke the Gods, that have brought them hither; and then Vs, that have trained them along, and drawne them into necessistie of playing for their lines, where they are fure to loofe them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first ; but now vee may even encourage your felues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee haue as often beaten as seene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as to drive them before you out of Gaule; and to winne the open Countrie, and fields of Italie; both of which yechaue obtained: now are yee to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the 20 riches within them; which this victoric shall make yours. Therefore play the sout Souldiers: and ere many houres paffe, yee shall bee Lords of all that the Ro-

When he had faid this; his brother Mago came to him, whom hee had fent to view the countenance of the Enemie. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to have with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that hee fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their 30 Generall would not be fo merrie, without great affurance. Whether it were fo, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories alreadic gotten, valued one Mago aboue many thousand Romans ; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the fad moode of his brother with a jeft, and thew himselse merrie vnto the Souldiers; this his answere was more manly, than was the relation of his discouerer. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene fent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not have returned with amore gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the fift : faying, that of the Frenchmen, to there were enough to be killed; enough to be taken prisoners; and enough to runne away. Euch fuch wordes as thefe, or fuch pleafant jefts as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but ferue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boafts. In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which hee had long before conceived the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile: Hee marshalled his Armie in such connenient order; that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doc 50 best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdues; but when we vied our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The groffe of his Armic following them he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly ferued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these hee ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countrie manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules viing long broad fwordes, that were forcible in a downe-right froke; the Spaniards, fhort and well-pointed blades, either to firike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fierceneffe; the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitic, made a gallant shew : and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and furious in giuing 10 charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt. which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were leffe cager, but more warie; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were ouer-preffed; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly vnto them both. For they faw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not bee feared, that any great calamitie should fall 20 vpon them, whilest the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrinke, or forbeare to imploy the vtmost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the Enemie could not preffe farre vpon them, without further engaging himfelfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse : by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retrait: The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should bee ouerhardly preffed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, Hee made them as it 30 were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the emptic foace from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinne, as ferning only to guide it orderly back, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, fwelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthred and thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have beene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who flood behinde it : though fuch figures, cut in braffe, as I haue seene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driven to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the 40 last rancks of his long batalions, and in the head of his reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the Riuer Aufidus, were the Gaules and Spanish horse, under the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Liuie faith Maharbal) with the Numidian light horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mage, had the leading of the Reare. The whole summe of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, wasten thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and Hee, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armie was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somwhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had beene found con- 50 uenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was indeede no bad way of relistance against Elephants to make the Rankes thick and short, but the Files long; as also to firengthen well the Rearc, that it might fland fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-allie themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailing was very unprofitable, for a fmuch as their charge is better fultained in front, than upon a long flanke. As for Emilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Affiftant; and in such cases it happens often, that wife men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, under the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentiue Varre the 10 other Conful, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeares Conful, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly rifen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and flingers of the Baleares: Afdrubal brake upon the Conful Paulos, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of service on horse back, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; fo that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake through. Where-10 fore they not only vied their Lances and Swordes; but rulhing violently among it the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from under them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driven by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Conful Paulus could not remedie, For Aldrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to bee resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell : so strongly, for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore 20 the two points of their battaile drew towards the midit; by whose aide, these Oppolites were forced to disband, and flie back to their first place. This they did in great hafte and feare; and were with no leffe hafte, and follie, purfued. Vpon the Africans, that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void roome enough; and for a fmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the fafe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was readie to reenforce them, when time should require. In this hastic retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had stood in the limbe or vtter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concaue surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside out-40 ward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, only rurning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thinne and broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng ofmen rowted, and feeming vnable to make relistance) had all the enemies foot been cast into this one great bodie, that was in a manner dissoluted. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victoric, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselues deepely within the principall ftrength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they 10 inclosed them, in a manner, behinde : and forward they could not passe farre, without remoning Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as coucred the Africans; who lay behinde it undifferened, untill now. For it is agreed, that Plus in vit. the Romans were thus empaled wnawares; and that they behaued themselues, as Hannib.

men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is itcredible, that they would have beene so mad, as to runne head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of flaughter; had they feene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines : but fince the Conful Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Afdrubal, having broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, sollowed voon them along the River fide, beating downe, and killing, as many as he could, (which 10 were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driven vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, not withstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuerthelesse hee cheared vp his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his owne from behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Eoman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he 20 was compelled, by wounds and weakeneffe, to forfake his horfe. Hereupon all his companie alighted, thinking that the Conful had given order fo to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to helpe their foot in distresse. When Hannibal (for he was neare at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Conful had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly faid, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand and foot : meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Associates, in the left wing, was meruailously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numicians : who beating vp and downe about that great fandic Plaine, raifed a foule dust; which a strong South winde, 20 blowing there accustomarily, draue into the eies and mouthes of the Romans. These, vling their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, we aried the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor fuffayring any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happie day of it. For when the battailes were even readic to joyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselues. This was good luck to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varre had not leafure to examine them; but caufed them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where he bad 40 them rest quietly till all was done. These crastie adventurers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Vnder their lackets they had short swordes and ponyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were flaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: fo that they did great mischiese, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Astrubal, having in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of A- 40 milius that rushed into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered formenarrow passage, betweene the River and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behinde the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom hee joyned, and gaue vpon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other fide : fo did it prognosticate a difmall florme vnto those, vpon whom it was readie now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine; thought it the best way, to avoide the danger by present flight. The Consul was no lesse wife than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in strining to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many thranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not have endured with their assistance. Now hee to found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounterhim. But of this; or of ought elfe, excepting hastic flight, his present leifure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his slying troupes, followed the light Numidians: appointed by Afdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittelt for that service. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly diffressed, and in a manner furrounded on all parts elfe. He brake them eafily; who before made ill relistance, being inclosed, and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turne. Here beganne a pittifull flaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whileft enery one fought to avoide 20 those enemies, whom hee saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Amilius, got vp to herfe, and faued themfelues; which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleeve it, than suppose that Livie so reporteth, to grace thereby his Historie with this following tale. CN. CORNELIVS LENTVLVS, galloping along by a place, where he faw the Conful fitting all blondied upon a flone, entreated him to rife and faue himfelfe; offering him his assistance and horfe. But PAVLVS refused it; willing LENTVLVS to shift for himselfe, and not to loof time: faying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into judgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guiltie himselfe of that dayes losse. Further he willed LENTVLVS to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to FABIVS: wil-30 ling them to fortific Rome, as fast and well as they could, and telling FABIVS, that Hee lived and died mindfull of his wholesome counsail. These wordes (peraduenture) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaile, or when hee beheld the first defeat of his Horse, at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he faid a good while before this; when he thought the Conful and his troupe, in little better case than if they had beene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeede as within a fack, whereof the African Battalions made the fides; the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Afdrubal with his horse, closed up the mouth; in which part, they first 40 of all were (huffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Amilius therefore, who could not fit his horfe, whileft the battaile yet lafted, and vyhilest the spaces yvere somewhat open, by which hee might have vyithdrawne himselfe; vvas now (had he neuer so vvell beene mounted) vnable to flie, having in his vvay fo close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaile hee fought no leffe valiantly, than hee had yvarily before, both abitained himselfe, and diffwaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day vvas vtterly loft, it had laine in his power to faue his ownelife, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that he either too much difestee-50 med himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was vycarie of the World, and his vnthankefull Citizens. But if fuch a refolution were praise worthie in Amilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Vicount Life, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewesburie, who died in the Battaile of Chafillon, more highly to be honoured. For Amilius was old, grienously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the ouerthrow received: Talbot was in the floure of his youth, vnhurt, eafily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to for sake his father; who foreseeing the loffe of the battaile, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone, and leave him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, faue two or three thousand. who (as Linie faith) escaped into the leffer campe; whence, the same night, about fixe hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, 10 partly dispersed, into Cannusium : the next day, the Roman Camps, both leffe and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Austidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed, but ere they could effect their defire, which they had well-neare done, the battaile was loft; and Hannibal, comming over the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly veelded. having loft two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming upon them with his victorious Armie, a great number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, 20 retired into their campe, and held the Enemie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whole fault or fortune was like ) that having ferued at Canna, were afterwards extremely difgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped it is uncertaine; but very few they were that faued themselues in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Conful recourred Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That he was so ill attended, it is no meruaile: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; fo that his nearest way thither, had beene through the midst of Hannibals Armie, if the paffage had beene open. Therefore it must needes be, that 30 when once he got out of fight, he turned vp fome by-way; fo disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of fuch as could not hold pace with the Conful, but tooke other waies, and were feattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts. were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into fundrie Townes. There died in this great Battaile of Canna, belides L. Amilias Paulus the Conful: two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourfcore Senators, or fuch as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall marke, as having beene Ædiles, Prators, or Confuls: among whom was Cn. 40 Secullus the last yeares Conful, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Linie makes no greater than three thousand foot, and three hundred horse: too few to have defended, for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman camps; which yet the fame Liuie faith, to have beene ouercowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better, to give credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and laying, That they were no leffe than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that the fe three thousand were only such as the Enemie spared, when the surie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either flaine or fled. So 50 the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the fide of Hannibal there died fome foure thousand Gaules, fifteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts; a losse not sensible, in the joy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal aduised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently beene at an end. But hee believed not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to ve a victorie.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

Ot without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Pablus the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their tra-uailes, than the truth of things, and information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers confeript. Noman of found judgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vied. For, to recompence his junioritie, (fuch as it was) hee produceth fubto flantia arguments, to justifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanitie of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering; which paines it is to bee suspected, that hee would not have taken, had hee beene borne in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and beene contented, to have all men thinke better and more honourably than it descrued, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall have cause to wish, that either they were fomewhat leffe Roman, or elfe, that fome Workes of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But fince this cannot be, we must be 20 sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and believe so much only to betrue, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probabilitie. This attentinecircumspection is needfull even at the present; such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulnesse, which we finde in the best Narration, of things following the Battaile of Canna. For it is faid, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Conful Terentius at Venusia; that others, to the number of tenthousand, got into Cinnustum, choosing for their Captaines yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conful Terentius Varro, joyning his companie vnto those of Scipio at Cannussium, wrote vnto the Senate, that hee had now well-neare ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Conful were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly 40 tilen, that had beene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Ca-PHA (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the ouerthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter enfuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth,

When Hannibal had facked the Roman campe, and truffed up the spoiles, forthwith he diflodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hapines, and many other people thereabout, to for fake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthege. The first Towns that opened the gates vnto him, was Coffa, where he laid up his baggage : and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grieuous losses, fullained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Countrie, especially the poorer fort of them, did hardly endure. but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto fuch of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being fo obslinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but feeking indeede, by all waies and meanes, to make them his, whilest all other motiues were to concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by injuries, sought to right himselfe and his countrie; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroicd. So be gaue them leave to choose ten of their number, that should bee sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome : and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to seele the disposition of the Senate: whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes prevailed not, as shall bee shewell indue 29 place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceincable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not only the Sammites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former ceneration veterly subdued, beganne to re-affume their wonted spirits : but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as fireightly conjoyned, as were any faue the Latines, changed on a sudden their love into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italie, if not (as somether 20 thought) of all the Earth : and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrie. whereof it was Head, fo great, faire, and wealthie, that it feemed no leffe convenient a feat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto sourraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle. and proud : and valuing themselves, like layes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Fomans their Patrons, and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the majestic of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately fo prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calanius an 10 ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held, by furthering all popular defires : whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: wherupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journie into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nearnes of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actuall rebellion. They had indeed no leifure, to treat about any articles of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the Multitude ( whose inconstant love Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vlage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without advice 50 of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promifed to yeeld vp their towne to Hannibal & to meet him on the way, with some of their nobilitie, that should affure him of all faithfull meaning; were driven to sit still, in a great perplexitie: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discoursed them-

Glues, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incenfed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The People, holding so tender a regard of libertie, that even the lawfull Governement of Magistrates grieued them, with an imaginaric oppression; had now good cause to searc, lest the Senators would become their Lords indeede, and, by helpe of the Romans, bring them under a more fireight subjection, than ever they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into some outrage, Pacavius made vse of to ferue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sate in Councell, in about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman; but, that the danger of for faking the Roman partie was not now the greatest : for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to joyne them-Selves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and save them harmelesse. This he spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and prinie vnto their delignes. Hauing throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promifed neuertheleffe to defluer them all, and to fetthings in quiet, if they would freely put themselues into his hands; offering his oath, or any other affurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor iffue forth, without his leave; Hee called the People to affembly; and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would bee glad to heare, hee told them, that these wicked Gouernours were furprifed by his pollicie, and all fast, readie to abide what sentence they would lav vpon them. Only thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessitie required. That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger voon the old. So rehearling vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their judgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthie of death. Choose then (faid he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Mul-20 titude, vnprouided for fuch an election, was filent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men fo nominated, were veterly difliked by the whole Assembly; either for some knowne fault, basenesse, and infufficiencie; or else euen because they were vnknowne, and therefore held vnworthic. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilest more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, having beene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacavius entreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleffe) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured An Pagavius, and effected him their Patron; but the Senators also, were governed by him to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for saving all their lives. Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to cast them downe: All the Citie being thus of one minde; only feare of the Romans, kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Canna, this impediment was removed; and few there were, that would open their mouthes to speake against the Rebellion. Yet for a fmuch as three hundred principal I Gentlemen of the Compans, did then serve the Romans in the Isle of Sieil: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed to farre, that Embassadors were fent vnto Terentias the Conful; to fee his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wherefocuer they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weake in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the feruice of their State; and defired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them, the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: faying, that all was loft; and that the Campans must now, nothelpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselues, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had somtimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to have added a foolish Inucctive against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of flaughtered carkafes, and to feede vpon mans flesh; with fuch other stuffe, as only bewraied his owne feare. As for the Campans themselues. He put them in minde of their present strength : they having thirtie thousand foot. and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he difmiffed them, prouder than they came: and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in adventuring 10 to seeke their ownelibertie. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they casily made Alliance, vpon these conditions: That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizen of theirs should bee subject vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case socuer, whether in Warre, or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliver vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themfelues would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honorable Citizen opposed himfelfe carneftly : vling, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong 20 Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, withing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were fending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most carnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the Towne: at which time he gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it, and cut it in peeces, that, by such a notable peece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forfaken.

Aducrtisement hercof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: aileaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection vnto any 30 Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalade, but found the walls too high, and was not well prouided, to lay fiege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great folemnitie and pompe: all the people iffuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the fight of that goodly Citie, and passed over his first Entertainements; Hecame into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promiling, that ere long all Italie, and Rome it felfe, should bee driven to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who 40 openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State; and vie him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius, deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if hee kept him aliue, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal fetled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Deeius Magins had openly dared to speake against him; being affisted by Perellathe fonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whilest hee was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authoritie kept him so from making any fuch attempt. All the Towne (belides) were fo earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are faid to have murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bathe.

The same course of foreune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citic. Nola Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and Acerra, were the Cities next adjoyning, that flood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakely manned; as they were indeede, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it felfe was in extreme feare of Hanmbals comming, at the first report of the overthrow at Canne: and the griefe of that 10 loffe was fo generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loffe alreadic received, or the feare of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to funt the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the firects were full. Courriers were fent forth, to bring affured tidings how all went: whereof when letters from the Conful Varro had throughly informed them, they were fo amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was faid) from their fatall bookes, buried aliue two men and women Gaules and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions: we may justly thinke, that Sibyl herselfe was instructed by the Deniil. Yet is it not 20 improbable, that extremitie of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Soothfavers; who ie detestable counsailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as alhamed of fuch Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embaffadour was fentto Delphi, to consult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire, with what prayers and supplications they might pacific the Gods; and obtaine an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnesse of their scare; though not seruing to give remedie. At the fame time came letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Octavilius : whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthiginian fleet, that wasted the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and contederate; and of another fleet, riding among the 30 Iles Agatei, which was in readineffe to fet vpon Lin beum, and the rell of the Roman Province, if the Prætor flirred alide, to the refeue of Hieron.

In the middeft of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Conful, that he might name a Dictator, to take four aigne charge of the Weater publique, with absolute power, as necessitie required. It must needes seeme strange that all forts of people went forth to meet the Conful, and bid him welsome home, gining him thankes for that he had not defpaired of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may feeme) by order from the Senate; which algreen (doubtleffe) prouided wifely, for vp-holding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie. had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people : what elfe would have 40 followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those that were subject vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (shough indeeds he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thankes they noised abroad a fame. which came perhaps vnto the cares of Hannibal , of their Magnanimiticand Confidence: that might feeme grounded on their remayning frength in his therefore was wifely done: But whereas Linie would have ve thinke, that it was done generoully, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned; if I beleeue him not It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe : had they dared to thew their indignation, they would have ftruck off his head; as in few yeares after, Cn. Fuluins had his life brought Lin. 1.20. into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthie, for a smaller 50 offence. St. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Distator: and T. Sempronius, Malter of the horfe. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a thousand horse: though with much difficultie; as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boies. These source Logions, are elsewhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and two Legions only fet downe, that had beene enrolled in the beginning of the yeare for custodie of the Citie. Wherefore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field; foure new ones of Pratextati, or Striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to bee reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them eight thousand sturdie flanes, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should deserve it by manfull service. This not sufficing; the Dictator proclaimed, that who socuer ought monic and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith beedifcharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serve in the Warre. To armethese Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the 10 spoiles of their enemies that had beene there set vp: among which, were sixe thoufand Armours of the Gaules, that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius. a little before the beginning of this Warre. To fuch mockerie had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their infolent oppressions, that they were faine to iffue forth of their ownegates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was readie to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-lake.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the Citie, but commanded, whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territorie. To the Messengers of the captines, audience was given by the Senate. They made car- 20 nest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poore kins-folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their fuit; which yet they obtayned not: Belides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthned by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to be too tender of fuch as had yeelded to the Enemie; much was alleaged against these who now craued ransome; but the special point was, that they were wilfully lost, fince they might have faued themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Confuls: they were told, that this was great prefumption. The truth was, the 30 State wanted monie: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the difbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we finde recorded. Neither must wee regard it, that the flaues which were armed for the warre, are faid to have cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would have ranfomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, denifed to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had beene feuere; when as indeede they were futeable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proofe. That Hannebal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the campe among their Masters, at no more, than enery one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome; and likely it is, that hee offered them at the 40 price, whereat he thought them current. But if wee should suppose, that by trading with Hamnbal, a better bargaine for flaues might have beene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withall consider, that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchifed) untill the warre should be ended. If Hannibal would have given such long day of paiment; it is likely that the Romans would have beene his chapmen: but feeing he dealt only for readie monie, they chofe rather to fay, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like aufteritie, vpon the fame reason, but contrarie pretence, was yied toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great to Battaile. These were charged, for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done fo. True it is, that in fuch cases (if ever ) that which they call raggione del Stato may serue for an excuse : when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing injuriesto private men. And so dealt the Romans now : condemning all those that had served at Canna, to be transported into Sicil; and there to serue, not as others did untill they had fulfilled twentie yeares in the warres, or elfe were fiftie yeares of age; but untill this warre should bee ended, how long soeuer it lasted, and that without reward. The same thriftie censure, was afterwards laid upon others, for their misbehaniour: but neuer vpon any man of qualitie, faue only (a good while after this, at better leifure) vpon Cucilius Metellus, and a few other hare-braind fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of fo great a loffe, were deuising, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet 10 had scarce one Towne within it. The inequalitie of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonaltie: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; neuer- Limber theleffe it was quietly digefted, the excuse being no leffe apparent than the fault. M. Iunius the Dictator, having dispatched all needfull businesse within the Ci-

tie, tooke the field with fine and twentie thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot finde: nor more of him, than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be prefumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater cuill : for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ostia with a fleet, readie to fet faile for Si-20 til, having one Legion aboord his thips, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces he was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme hee could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, hee fent thefe of his new

Leuie to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: deliuering the fleet, emptie of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campans) to let in the Carthiginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by feeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore he made great journies thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the E-20 nemie. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples : affaying by faire wordes, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong, and not intected with any the least touch of dissolatie: it had also a fure Hauen; whereby it flood in the leffe feare, of fullayning much inconvenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrie. But at Wolait was thought a valuable confideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vererly vindone. So thought the Multitude: and fuch talke vied fome, that had little feare of their owne private want or povertic, but a great defire to gratific the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chiefe; a stout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of especiall marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done 40 good service to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle viage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thankes he could vnto so courteous an Enemie. Marcellus percei. uing this, wrought vpon the same case nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman state, had not repaired vinto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than fuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainement, being himselfe also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantius fo farre in love with him, that nothing could be attempted 50 within Wola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and affaied, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans : but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptoric answere, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by composition; and so returned back againe to Nola. Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nolabore vnto him: who although they durft not firre in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies affailing him without, like enough it feemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne defires. Hee therefore brought his Armie close to the Towns, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee fought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages betweene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if 10 once M. reellus, with all his forces, could bee trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rife; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemie. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertifed : and fearing, left the Conspirators would shortly aduenture, even to finde him busied within the Citie, whileft the Carthiginians should scale the walls; he thought it the furest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and fend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three feuerall gates looking towards the Enemie: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder ; against whom he had cuftomarily iffued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was 20 further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that furely all was discourred, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon hee bad his men bring ladders, and make readie for the affault; which was done in all hafte. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing leffe, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: fuddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldelt of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected fallie the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were fome of them flying before Marcelius, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like fort issued they of the new-leuied Companies, 30 vpon the enemies backs. The fudden terrour was more auaileable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was fo great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the brauest Acts performed in all that warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be ouer-come. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about three core and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Sueffula. Hannibal in the meane feafon was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wildome to loofe time in perswalions, but laid sigge vnto it, and beganne on all sides to close it vp. This ter- 40 rified the People, who knew them selpes vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite furrounded; they sole out by night, and left him the Towns emptie; which he facked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Distator, that he was about Cafiline, thither went Hannihal: as being vnwilling that an Enemie to neare should disquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It feemes, or rather indeede it is plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durft with a small part of his Armie seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon fo flight an occasion as the death of some two thoufand of his men, at the mothered those not flaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden so eruption; witneffeth chiefly, in what great feare they flood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were : that having three yeares since demanded at Carthage, the bodie of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre

from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not reliftlesse. At Casilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towns, and held it. Fine hundred of the Pranestines there were, and aboue foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaile of Canna, being fent by their feuerall States to the campe: whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and fent them back for rowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, under whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they me; and staied. Neither had they staied there long, 10 cre they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campans into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Pranestines and their fellowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townesmen in a night, and fortified the Weflerne part of the Towne (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemie. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that thefe of Caliline were, as the rest of the Campans, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancie in defence of the place witnesseth, upon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, an thinking to have encountred with greater forces; but these few found him more worke than he expected. Divers affaults hee gave, but was still repelled with losse: and many fallies they made, with variable eyent. The Enemie mined; and they countermined: oppoling so much industrie to his force, that he was driven to close them vp. and fecke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracebus, that was Mafter of the horse, lay with the Roman Armie higher vp the River: who faine would have relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Sueffula could not come : his way being stopped by the ouer-flowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of 20 the Campans, if he departed. Thus it is reported; but if the water staied his journie, fuch entreaties were needleffe. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome folong, as till extreme famine had confumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was loft, because the Romans durst not aduenture to raise the siege. Barrells of corne were sent by night, floting downe the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stuck among the Willowes on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was discoursed and prevented; Gracehus cast a great quantitic of Nuts into the streame, which faintly fultained the poore belieged men. At length, when all foode was spent, and whatfocuer grew greene under the walls was gathered for fallets; the Carthaginians 40 ploughed up the ground: whereon the belieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal feeing this, admired their patience; and faid, That he meant not to stay at Cafiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacie; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ranfome, which when they had paid, hee quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians hee placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campans; vnto whom he restored it. To the Pranefine Souldiers great thankes were given, and louing rewards; among which, they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present so condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Pranefle: which is no weake proofe, of the good chate wherin the Cities flourished, that vvere subject to the Roman Gouernement. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and confumed much of his time, that might otherwise have beene better spent. him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armic, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

Hen Migo, the sonne of Amilear, had spent some time about the taking in of fuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canna; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victorie. 20 He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls

his brother had fought; what Confuls he had chaced, wounded, or flaine; how the stout Romans, that in the former warre neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captaine, because he neuer durst aduenture to come to battaile; that, not without reafon their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slaine of them about two hundred thousand, and taken aboue fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Sammites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citic, and fitto be not only (as alreadic it was) 30 Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe feat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had beene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He said it was even at an end, if they would now purfue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repaire their broken forces. Hee willed them to consider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrie; that so many Battailes had much diminished his brothers Armie; that the Souldiers, who had so well descrued, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage: 40 which the victorie would requite with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were flaine, to bee poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, fo great, as the thage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull advertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinarie welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy, Himiles, a Senator 50 adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Whether he were fill of opinion, that Hannibal should bee King , was the yeelded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the Gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it bee not likely that or (as others would rather haueit) no more than one; adding, that by this might appoore, the brapeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitie, for a smuch as none but the * principall uate men was of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament. notaltogether Who fo confiders the former Punick Warre, may easily finde, that the State of Car-

Hanno made the same formall answere, which Linie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Schators Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull ouerthrow received at the llands Agateis: yet the summe of his speech appeares to have beene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; faying, It ill befeemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had beene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled for footh with spoile, to make request for meat and monie. To these cauills, if anfwere were needfull, it might be faid, That other bootie than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few a filuer fluds in the bridles and trappings of a Lin, 1,22, their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine convoy of monie and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Armie in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards faid to have done, when they wanne the campe of Afdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journie towards Italie) then might fuch an objection more justly have beene made vnto his demand of a supply. 20 But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein hee best might hope to prenaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to feeke peace, whilest they had so much the better in warre.

What would have beene the issue of this counsaile, if it had beene followed, it were not easie to say. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignitie, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue beene kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of so many thamefull ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submiffine behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer 20 than vntill fuch time, as Rome was at leifure from all other warres. This counfaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeede very pestilent; and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that fortie thousand Numidians, fortic Elephants, and great abundance of filter, should bee sent over to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twentie thousand foot, and soure thousand horse, should be build in Spaine; not only to supply, as neede should require, the Armies in that Province, but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully fent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to taxe the rechlesse improvidence of 40 Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canna to Rome, or in refreshing his Armicamong the delights of Capha: the next yeares worke would have finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campans, would have beene commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to beeimploied in the following warre. But either the too much carelefnesse of those, that were loth to make hafte in laying out their monie, before extreme necessitie requiredit; or the craftie malice of Hanne, and his fellowes, working vpon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commoditie, than sense of the publike neede; vtterly peruerted, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the 50 order that had beene so well set downe. The b Elephants were sent : and some b Lundie. monie peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was loft of that which alreadie had beene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and sundrie accidents of warre. Only fome small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journie of Aldrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled therevnto, till many yeares were past, and the Romans had recovered their firength.

Here wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthie Tradeof merchandize. For it is not long, fince the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidious tyrannic of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessitie twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impouerished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of fo much monie, as was to bee difburfed for re- 10 deeming of peace, after the loffe at . £ gateis. Yet we fee, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, belides those alreadic on foot, are appointed to the service in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of monie in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other fide, having three or foure yeares together beene forced to some extraordinarie cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their desence. Such advantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthie merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, aboue the Romans : who lived on the fruits of their ground; and received their Tributes 20 from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leifure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage, the impudence of Roman fallhood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discouered plainely whence the jealousie was bred, that this mightie Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, having giuen vp hoftages, euen before the Roman Armie did fet forth, to performe what soeuer should beeenjoyned them, with condition that their Citic might not beedestroied; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but 20 the Towne must needes be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which yee now line, is not fo fit for peaceable men, fuch as yee promise to become hereaster, as is the Trade of husbandrie; an wholsome kinde of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though fugred with glofing wordes, plainly shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hastie growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter what soeuer it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroied; He may seeme, 40 not only to have had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the Citic, but much more vnto these times, and the great height whervnto it rose, even suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not beene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: having every one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in Victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had beenerequilite in the execution. It was easie for Hanne to perswade couctous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Armie into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisedome, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the Encmics; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Gouernement of an ambitious man. and his brethren; who having once (if they could fo doe) finished the warre, might eafily make * Hannibal a King, and fubdue Carthage, with the forces that sheehad given them to the conquest of Rome.

By fuch malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne flacknesse, incredulitie, dulneffe, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perfuaded rather to make small difbursements in Spaine, than to set vp all their rest at once in Italie, Yet was it indeede impossible, to hold a Countrie of so large extent, and so open a coast, as that of that so hee 10 Spaine, free from all incursion of the Enemie : especially the affection of the Naturalls being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been with Legions, to make a running warre, by which the Romans might have beene found occupied, as knowing no euen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to deferre the profecution of their maine intendment a King. Liu. against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the 10,21. fides of fo great a Province, then must Emporia have been belieged and forced: which by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a readie and secure Harbour. But the Towne of Emporie was too firong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; haan uing not aboue foure hundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towns of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Grecians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporie, that was, befides the proper strength, like to be so well affisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would have been a worke of little leffe difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canne: yea it had beene in effect none other than to alter the feat of the warre; which Hannibal had alreadie fixed, with better judgement, neare vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being fuch, as caused it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much more casily have diverted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by fending an Armie to Carthage; and by taking the like courfe, they now endeuoured to change the feat of the warre, transferring it out of Italie

20 troubled about expelling the Romans veterly out of Spaine : whom they might into Spaine. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwife, than as it is accessarie to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke atopportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they fet not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch : yet they that thought him fo, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, as long 40 as they were plaufible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they fuffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilear, to wearie themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakely affifted; as if the industric of these Barchines had beene somwhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were farre leffe honorable than the People of Rome: not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parlimonic vsed toward their owne Mercinaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: fo the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with 50 feeling lighes, of their negligence in supplying Hanniba!, after the victorie at Canme; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunitie, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthic Historian Liuie, the tender love of his owne Countrie, which made him give credit vnto Fabius and others: yet mult we not, for his fake, believe those lies, which the unpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needleffe to rehearfeall that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. Hee faith of Amilear and his men at Erix, in the former warre, That having cleane spent their strength, and being euen to broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrarie hercunto we finde in the Life of AMILCAR, fet downe by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to bee in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any warre. These wordes, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infuling fuch spirit into them; may be taken as not over-liberall. For in the Treatie of peace betweene Amilear and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forfake Sieil, threatning, that otherwise he would not talke of any composition: Amilear boldly bad him choose, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the 20 Armes, which his Countrie had put into his handes to vie against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let similear have his will, and not to fland with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their handes of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man confumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; faying, that howfocuer Amilear, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaued themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference 20 betweene Fabius (as also perhaps betweene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightic Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that how socuer Lime introduceth Hanne, in one place, joyning very foolifhly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands * Agateis, with the great feruices of Amilear at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet a ellewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappie conduct) into the fame Hanno his mouth, making him fay, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the loffe of their fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to with, 40 that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stampe, had either written

(if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tenderaffe-

Aion of Liuie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations:

Strangereports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before A S D R V B A L the sonne of AMILCAR sollowed thence his brother HANNIBAL into Italie.

Thath been ethewed alreadie, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conful, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hamibal at his defect from the Alpes, fent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armic, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foureteen thou and force the Conful teene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had beene alotted vito this Gonful, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Hansonidal: who tince he was marching into Halle with the strength of has Armice, P. Scipio beleeued, that a good part of these his owne forces might well bee spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie some of the number back with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publus himselferemayned in Halle all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a slees of thirtie Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Pronince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat meruailous. For they continually preuailed in Sprine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from 20 their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that wee have cause to wonder, how the Enemic could so often finde meanes to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrie from the tyrannie of Carthage, might casily winne vnto their Confederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durftaduenture to breake it : fo the ancient reputation of the first Conquerours, might sexue to arme the Naturalls against these Invaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans; were it only by the memorie of fuch ill fuccesse, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treasure: which easily raifed fouldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirstic Na-20 tions. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinfmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or ferning the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durft be bold to fay it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither fo many, nor fo great, as they are fet out by Linie. This we may be bold to fay, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Livie in his person, maketh an objection vnto Scipie, which neither Scipie, nor Linie for him, doth answer, That if A SDRVBAL were vanquished, as Scirio would say, by him in Spaine : strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should inuade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Aldrubal being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to cleape 40 out of a battaile, faue only by the steepe descent of Rocks, ouer a great River that lay at his back, ranne away with all his monie, Elephants, and broken troups, over Tagus, directly toward the Pyrenees, and fo toward Italie; vpon which hee fell with more than threefcore thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a peece of ground very defencible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his monie and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemie:

Or how it could be true, that the his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to have done in the lath battaile between him and Actrio from breaking into his camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorrie, that

50 all Carthagiman records of this warre, and Spanifs, (if there were any) being wtierly loft, we can know no more thereof, than what it bath pleafed the Romans to rell vs: wito whom it were no widome to give too much credit. In this regard, I will fummarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly infifting on parti-

(n. Cornelius landed at Emporie, an Hauen-towne not farre within the Pyrenees, retaining (till the fame name with little inflexion: That by the fame of his clemencie he allured many Nations to become subject vnto Rome, as the storie beginnes of him, I could eafily beleeue, if I understood by what occasion they had neede to vse his elemencie, or he to give fuch famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and having no jurisdiction in the Countrie. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well infinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practife had the better successe, for that hee feemed to have none other errand, than fetting them at libertie. This pretext availed with some : others were to bee hired with monie : and some hee compelled to 10 yeeld by force or feare; especially, when he had wonne a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that heeremembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maieflatem Pop. Rom. comiter conferuent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they Orat. po Corn. (bould gently (or kindly) up-hold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeede an obscure couenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romana; of the Roman sursidiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrie wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by 20 Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more casily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians, Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouernour over them, as over the rest of the Province betweene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalitie of their Countrie vnto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him nov only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leaving them to be gouerned 20 by Hanno, at his diferetion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the prefent cuill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by feeking to avoide it. This bad affection of his Province, would not fuffer Hanno to temporize. Tenthousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him : belides which it is like, that some forces hee was able to raise out of his 40 Province. Therefore hee adventured a battaile with Scipio; wherein hee was overthrowne and taken. Following this victoric, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Afdrubal having passed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot and a thousand horse fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelelle, as after a victoric, rouing abroad in the Countrie; and with great flaughter draue them abourd their ships. This done, he ranne vp into the Countrie, where he with-drew the 11lergetes from the Roman partie, though they had given hoftages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his fleet: where having set things in order, he returned back, and made toward Afdrubal; who durft not abide his comming, but with-drew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the

daies; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to veeld: and for this their obstinacie, they were amerced twentie talents of filtuer. During the fiege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are faid to bee the first which embraced the friendship of Scipjo, should, without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the fudden, in the next newes that wee heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntari-10 ly ditionis Romana ; subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the storie, after a Linday

few lines, hold warre against Scipio, without any affistance of the Caribaginians. Neither can I beleeve, that Afarubal, as it were by a charme, flirred up the Illergeles, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take armes in his quarreil; whilest himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too farre into the Countrie, was beaten by Afdrubal back to his ships, whence heedurst not sirre, vntill Winter came on : at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning upon 20 them, vnlooked for, through a deepe fnow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the reft, we may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefit; helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthagmians; and contrariwise, voon fense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grieuous tyrannie, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent toliue vnder their owne Countrie Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours fent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie : even from henceforth vnto the dayes of August us Cafar; till when they were neuer throughly conquered.

The yeare following this, Cn. Scipio had a victoric against the Carthaginians, in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too far on ground, he tooke; and thereby grew Mafter of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victorie, about one hundred and twentie Nations, or pettic Estates, in Spaine, are said to have submitted themselues vnto the Romans, and given Hollages: whereby Adribal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the Land, and hide himselfe in Lustrania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Afairt al hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though having cafily vanquished the Illergetes) went 40 not forth to meet him, but firred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects and had given him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes; wherein they slue fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio. with the supply before mentioned : and henceforward the two brethren joyntly administred the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did, hand cunctanter; without feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, and beliege Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had alreadie subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able 50 to vanquish Astratal. Bostar, the Gouernour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and heartie good will of the Countrie, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; asresting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crastic Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generalls : perswading them, as hee had done Bostar, to make the Liberalitie their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue: if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am wearie of rehearling so many particularities, whereof I can beleeue so few. But since wee finde no better certainties, we must content our selves with these.

The yeare following was like vnto this: Afdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Afdrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and five hundred horse, out of Africk: Hee repaires his fleet; and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, revolt vnto the Romans: because they had beene chidden the last yeare for their negligence, which had betraied the Nauie. The repolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpestans, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischiefe, so that Asarabal is faine to make a journie to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly affaile him, that they drive him, for very feare, to incampe himselfe strongly on an high pecce of ground; whence hee dares not come forth to give them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein hee had laid vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrie round 20 about. This good fuccesse breedes negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asimubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beates them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Afarubal should leade his Armie forthwith into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had beene informed by his letters in what hard cafe he was, and had fo weakely supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus wee finde it reported: and that you the very rumour of this his journie, almost all Spaine was readic to fall to the Romans. Afdrubal therefore fends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be fo : or, if they will needes haue it fo, that then they must fend him a Success- 30 four, and well attended with a strong Armie, which to employ they should finde worke more than enough; fuch notable men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excule: Afdrubal must needes bee gone; and Himileo, with fuch forces as are thought expedient for that feruice, both by Land and Sea, is fent to take the charge of spaine. Wherefore Aldrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of monie, that hee might have wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gaules; through whose Countries hee must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he laies great Impositions upon all the Spaniards his subjects: and having gotten toge- 49 ther as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward therus. The Societs hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege there (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Aldruba! : who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. 'I he Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more casily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather bee vanguished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are flaine; and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the bartailes were throughly joyned. Their campe the Romans take and spoile: whereby (questionlesse) they are meruallously enriched; all the monie that could be raked together in 50 Spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes event joynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrie flood in doubt before; and puts Aldrubel to farre from all thought of transiling into Palit, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to

Rome : and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they have neither monie, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Armic and Fleet; That all is wanting; so as vnlesse they may bee supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarrie any longer in the Prouince. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the loffe at Canna, to helpe it felfe at home. Yet reliefe is fent : how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is leffe questionable. At the comming of this supply, the two Scipie's pursue Afdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What elfe can we thinke; that remember the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his owne safetie? They finde him, and Mago, and Amilear the sonne of Bomilear, with an Armie of threefcore thousand men, belieging Hiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably conjecture to have flood, where Carnnena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterward called Forum Inla, quite another way) a Towne of the Iller getes their nearest Neighbours, for hauing revolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, with want of victuailes. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies camps, with terrible flaughter of all that relift them; and having victualled the 20 place, encourage the townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the befregers, in their behalfe. So they iffue forth, about fixteen thousand against threescore thousand : and killing more of the Line, 1:23. enemies, than themselves were in number, drive all the three Carthiginian Commanders, every one, out of his quarter; and take that day, befides prifoners and other bootie, fiftic and eight Enfignes. The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibili, that flood a little Southward from the mouth of I-wealthie carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. Howforuer it happens, the Carthazineans (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Inabili: where there are of them about thirteene thousand flaine, and about three tin, loss. thousand taken; besides two and fortie Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Linie gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeare, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

berns. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedic of carning monie by warre for thus te-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had monie to pay them: fince Afdrubal was lately driven to poll the Coun-

In the beginning of the next yeare, great Armies of the Spaminds rife against Afarubal; and are overthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum altum, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilear, P. Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with vistuailes, being strong and defencible; as intending to make it his feat for a while. But the Countrie round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also vpon some straglers, or such as lagged behinde their fellowes in march, they have cut off two thouland of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto fome place more affured. So Pub. so withdrawes him felfe vnto Mons Victoria: that riling fomewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouer-lookes the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Curthaginians purfue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Aldrubal the sonne of Gelco, with a full Armie, arrives to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neare incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places therabouts, is discouered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himfelfe to an high peece of ground; where they beliege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Caffulo, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farredistant from them, and seated on the head of the River Batis. Neverthelesse the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Reman garrison; hoping to winne it by famine. Wee may justly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Castule, yea and the Koman Armie lying so close by them, and to seeke aduentures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene so grieuously beaten the yeare before. But thither they goe : and thither fol- 10 lowes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battailes kills aboue twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fixe and thirtie Ensignes. This victorie (doubtleffe) is remarkeable : confidering that the greatest Roman Legion at thistime, confifted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians beliege Bigarra: but that fiege is also raised by Cn. Scipie. Thence the Cartha. ginians remove to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lafteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victorie, and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed; and twelve thousand men; three thou- 20 fand prisoners taken, and seuen and fittie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe : but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these ouerthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troupes of Afarubal: who having also hired some of the Garles, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and loofeth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed, to leave Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; fince, in behalfe of 30 that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not recoursed it long before, fince wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now befieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goetheir way without it: fo as they neede not to blufh, for having fo long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they winne Sagantum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; 40 and wherein we may be affured, that the Carthaginians would have diffurbed them, if they had beene able.

But over-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceine none, than this recourse of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Afarubals journie; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they have landed at Emporie, an Hauen-towne, built and peopled by a Colonic of the Phoceans, kinne to the Oisfilians, friends to the Romans; They have eafily wonne to their partie, loft, recoucred, and loft againe, fome pettie bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswafton, other 10 whiles by force, and fometimes by their owne vnfetled passions; and now finally they have wonne a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may cafily beleeue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by furprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action wee finde no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like fort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembred, after euery one of which Afdrubal fate downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed readie to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquilhed, to carrie the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cries of their Enemies; but to fortific themselves within their owne places of frength, and therein to attend the leuie and arrivall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wanne Saguntum, they would not have confumed a whole yeare following, in practifing only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeares businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, That they have yeelded yo themselves vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman Campe. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; vnlesse perhaps in those dayes it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Liui followes, to call enery Messenger, or stragler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of 10 that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, fend an Armie of thirtie thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chofen, and carried into Italie, there to deale with their Countrimen that follow Hannibal in his warres: But if any of these three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him fuch newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the leffe vnwilling to follow Afdrubal, when he shall next have a desire to leade them into Italie. Hereof wee finde more than probabilitie, when these Mercinarie Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Armie in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this accesse of strength, divide their forces, 20 and seeke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Astrubal, the fonne of Amilear, is nearest at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order : but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroied; Mage, and Afarubal the sonne of Gife, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is fine daies march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrie, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Public therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leauing the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer journie to make. comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago, and Adrubal the sonne of 40 Gifes, are not studying how to runne away : they finde no such necessitie. They joyne their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him fo hardly, that hee is driven to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches : wherein he thinkes himselfe not well affured. Especially he is vexed by Masanista, Prince of the Massassia, Numsdians bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honour of this feruice is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is comming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suessetani, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be ftreight shut up, and besteged, Heisliues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leaving T. Fonteius his 30 Lieutenant, with a small companie, to defend the campe. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues fo long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all fides : neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Sapie, vncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is ftruck through with a lance, and flaine : very few of his Armie escaping the fame destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twentie dayes after. At his meeting with Afdrubal, the Celtibertan Mercinaries all forfake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countric. If Anitorgis, where Aldrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it; a Celliberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly beleeue, that they were wonne by Afdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to ftay them; and no leffe vnable, without to their helpe, either to relift the Enemie, or to joyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keepes his mentogether. Afdrubal preffeth hard vpon him : and Mago, with Afdrubal the sonne of Gefco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is ouer taken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonic ground, where growes not so much as a shrub, vnfit for desence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes, of easie ascent on enery side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-faddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weake defences the Carthaginians soone teare in sunder: and, breaking 20 in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that faving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoyning, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had lest in his camp, as is before faid. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they fay, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on cuery side, in so bare a ground as affoorded not a shrub to couer them, could breake out, and shrowd themfelues within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armic, had little hope to remaine long fafe withinit. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who ha- 30 uing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martin before Fonteins the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Afdrabal, the sonne of Gesco, comming upon them; this L. Martius fo encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately flaine) and admonisheth themos their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie per haps he might have gotten, but that hee wifely founds the retrait; referving the furie of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately van- 40 quished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former securitie; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps du gard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemie were neare. Martius therefore animates his fouldiers with lively wordes; and tells them, That there is no adventure more fafe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being under-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of service. So he leades them forth by night, and seales vpon the campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a-sleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without refistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know 50 not which way. All passages out of their campe Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and runne away toward the campe of Afdrubal the sonne of Amilear, that lay fixe miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley betweene their two campes he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall enery one, and are cut in peeces. But lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarme before his comming; Martin hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speede, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficultie he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceined, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can faue themselves from the furie of the fword. Thirtie seuen thousand of the enemies perish in this 10 nights worke; befides a thousand eight hundred and thirtie, that are taken prisoners. Hercunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand flaine : and that in another battaile with Afarabal, there were flaine ten thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie, taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Linie therefore hath elsewhere well obserued. That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his fouldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Linie reporteth as a common tale. not giving thereto any credit : and temperately concludeth, I hat this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with lo small forces, and in 20 such diffresse, He could clearely get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were farre leffe than that which is here fet downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good service, what socier it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthie to hold the place of their Vicegrent in Spaine: which the better to mitmate vinto them, He shield himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moved with the tidings, than the case required: and therefore took such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hamibal came to the gates of Rome, erethe Companies, levied to serve in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for desence of the Citie is selfe, but shipped them in all haste for 30 Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they shought it toogreat for him, and were oftended at his presumption in surpring it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the solidiers abroad make choice, among themselues, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spaine: carrying with him about six thouland of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Hors, and of the Latines sight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of kome beganne to prosper in Italia, and affoorded meanes of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the wistories of Martin would ill have served, either to keepe sooting in Spains, or to so sopic the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alfres. For when Caudius, landing within sow forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was under Martins and Fantins as so from the cuerthrowes received, than of those miraculous vistories, whereof Martins had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman partie was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it could not easily bee deuised. Yet Chaudius advanced boldly towards Martins all the brother of Hamibal: whom he found among the Mastern, neare enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no flue, but only through a streight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should have tempted any man of vnderstanding to incampe in such a place, I so doe not finde: and as little reason can I finde in that which followed. For it is said.

That Markel Sening himselfe thus clother we made offers ordenate forth with out of

o doe not finde: and as little reason can I finde in that which followed. For it is said, That As farubal, seeing himsels thus lockt vp, made offer to depart for th-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Province to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed; That he spent many daies, in entertayning parlee with Claudius about this businesse. That night by night hee connected his foot-men

Снар.3. §.11.

(a few at a time) through very difficult paffages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a mistieday, Hee stole away with all his Horse and Elephants. leauing his campe emptie. If we confider, that there were at the same time, besides this Afdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; wee shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicitie of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for fo great a Gountrie, with one of these three Chiestaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night: the Horse and Elephants casily following them in a darke millie day. Wherefore in giving beliefe to fuch a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherin the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to 10 haue beene of farre lesse value. Howsoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doc, served to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recover the old which they had loft. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chofen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardleffe of their good deferts, had repealed their Election, and fent a Propretor whom they fancied not fo well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconful, and (perhaps) yong Scipie by name : as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reviued in one of the same Familie. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the fon 20 of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spaine.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk . where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrie. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie; and other Vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vie he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, sauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanitie; How he vied to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some fecret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must have beene one of the Gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to have conversed with his 20 Mother, entring her chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answeres; I hold them no better than meere fables, deuised by Historians, who sought thereby to adde vnto the glorie of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not only to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generalitie, but also in great worth of one fingle man. To this end nothing is left out, that might ferue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of vinquestionable truth, That when a Proconful was to be chosen for Spaine, there durft not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much assonished thereat; That 40 when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himselfe in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about source and twentie yeares of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be seene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martins no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the seare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Clandius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Afdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was readic to abandon. But vpon theseinco- 10 herences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willing-

P. Scipio was fent Proconful into Spaine; and with him was joyned M. Junius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirtie Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the same of Scipio's arrivall, it is faid, that Embaffages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a majestic, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the leffe they could give any reason of it. If wee must beleeve this, then must wee needes beleeve, that their teare was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the same of so yong a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing : but fpent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage : vpon which he came vnexpected, with fine and twentie thousand foot, and two thousand fine hundred horse, his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. Hee affailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wanne it by affault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much considence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more flenderly, than was requilite. Yet it might have beene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discouered vnto Scipio, a secret pasfage vnto the walls; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or 20 thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, retembled the old and great Carthage in fituation; standing upon a demi-Iland. betweene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher men of Tarracon had founded; and finding in some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deepe,or (at most) wading up to the Nauill, Scipio thrust thereinto fome Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the wals without refulance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the natural! strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; casily forced agate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootic was found 30 within the Towne, Liuie himselfe cannot certainely affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasurie, we may easily perceive, how great a vanitie it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk and Spaine, was heaped up in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with fingular courtefie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in fuch gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to fo great a benefit. Hercupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two pettic Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, nearest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus. to for sooke the Carthaginian partie; and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vant himselfe, ascommonly fugitiues vie, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in revolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and inuited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeede no vnfure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the tlergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) for faken the Carthaginian partie, and floutly held themselves as friends to (n. Scipio; then could nothing have beene devised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; exculing, as new, his taking part with the same, so when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that how socuer the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer Masters of the Countrie till this worthie Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in fending them home, wanne vnto himfelfe the affured loue and affiliance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this losse, were very sorrie: yet neuerthelesse they set a good face on the matter: faying, That a yong man, having stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farretransported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vincle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more convenient temper. Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should be bold to sav. That the Carthaginians were at this time bufie, in fetting forth towards Italic; and that Scipto, to divert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vp- 10 on the like occasion, satedowne before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not beene much amisse, if the passage ouer the Lake had beene vndiscouered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to fuch good iffue vpon the fix it day: yet in the generalitie of the bulineffe, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Astrubal should bee staied from going into Italie, than that haife of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his journie; Mago, and Afdrubal the sonne of Gifco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilest the maine of the Carthaginian forces, under Adrubal the sonne of amilear, 20 went to a greater enterprise: euen to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Hiftorians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Astrabal was beaten into Italie: whither hee ranne for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, fay they, comming vpon Afdrubal; his Vantcourrers charged folustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drawe them into their Trenches : and made it apparent, even by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemie. Afdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a River, very steepe of ascent, and not case of accesse on the forelide; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On 30 the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he ftrongly incamped himfelfe; and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauerie, that he might not seeme to hide himselse within his Trenches, than for that he durft aduenture his Armie to the hazard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such advantage of place could not faue him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recoursed even footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hilltop: whither although the afcent were very difficult, and his Elephants beflowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their 40 way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is faid, that there was no way to flic. Out of fuch a battaile, wherein he lost eight thousand men, Astrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troups, to have marched towards the Pyrences, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight beganne. Neuerthelesse Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to have consulted with him about this warre; and finally to have concluded, that goe he needes must, were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italie; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, have too long detained vs.

The great troubles that HANNIBAL raifed in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. POSTHVMIVS the Roman Generall, with his whole Armie, is flaine by the Gaules. PHILIP King of Macedon, enters into a League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Romans, joyning with the Etolians, make warre upon PHILIP in Greece : and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their busneffe against the Carthaginians.

E left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where hee and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may bee thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mightic aide, as was decreed to bee sent thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to drive away their Cattaile to Geryon: his victories affoording him little other profit, than fultenance for his Armie; by making him Mafter of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forc'd fome walled Townes, in like fort as he did Geryon, and the Cafile of Canno: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the an hunger, that his Armie must have endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill come were ripe, would have grieuously punished him for such imploiment of the Sommer. This may have beene the reason; why, hee forbore to adventure vpon Rome after his victorie at Canne. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainetie) to carrie the Citie at his first comming; want of victualles would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a slege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had presented himselfe vnto 30 them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeare; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauaile was palt, when fo many States of Italie were become his: the yeare following, the Samnies, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which folong had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was paffed ouer joyfully, fauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to fecond the welcome report of those mightic forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promifed supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not : only we finde, that af-40 ter this he had aboue thirtie of them; whereas all, faue one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had beene lost in his journic through the marithes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischieses the persuasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a fafer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as hee himselfe had done; and increase the Armic, by hyring the Barbarians in the journie; than to commit the maine firength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: effecially wanting a commodious Hauen to receive the fleet that should carrie such a number of Men, Horses, and 30 Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Happibal must rest content; and feeke, as well as he can, to fatisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeare serued, He tooke the field; and having finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Hauen-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian fleet; or take from his

The great faith of the Petilians is worthic to be recorded, as a notable testimonie of the good gouernement, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campans, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrarie; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignetie, and were now transported with ambition: which Reason can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe : where their Messengers received answere from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieue their Affociates 20 that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publikely fent from Gities of the Roman subjection, that had a priuate jurisdiction within themselues) fell downe to the ground, and humbly befought the Fathers, notto give them away: promifing to doe and fuffer what socue was possible, in defence of their Towne against the Carthogonians. Hereuponthe Senate fell to confultation againe: and having throughly confidered all their forces remaining, plainely confessed, that it was not in their power to give any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne fafetie; as having alreadie discharged their faith to the vimost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) heldout 30 fome moneths: and having striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparant possibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victoric ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeede in fuch ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might have reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their loffe at Cauna; they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warrethat lay vpon them so reare at hand : it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Pretor they had fent, with an Armie of fine and twentie thousand, into Gaule; 40 to the Illyrian King Pineut they had fent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had fent, to require, that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetitus Pharius, their Subject and Rebell, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little futeable to their former glorious concents. Possibn with all his Armie was cut in peeces by the Gaules, in such fort that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There v as a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litans, through which he was to paffe. Again this comming, the Enemies had fawed the Trees so farre, that a little force would for the cast them downe. When there 50 fore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gaules, that lay about the Wood, beganne to cast downethe Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were over-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before.

How this tedious worke, of fawing so many Trees, could take defired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the denice was subject; I doe not well conceine. Yet some such thing may have beene done; and what failed in the stratageme, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthie to be omitted, as a monument of the sanage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countrie now fo civill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleansed, and trimmed up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and confecrated in their principall Temple, as an noly o veffell, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no leffe than the calamitie. But forrow could give no remedic to the mischiefe; and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentus, who raigned within a few yeares following, the Romans dealt vpon even termes; entreating their affiliance against Philip and Perfeus; not commanding their dutie, as Vallalls. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having affured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying leifure to looke into the doings abroad, Hee fent Embaffadours to Hammibal: with to whom he made a league, vpon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italie, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, affift the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italie, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be eleft entire vnto the State of carthago; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there asfift Philip, vntill he had fubdued all his Enemies: (which were the Atolians, Thratians, King Antiochus, and others) leauing semblably vnto him the full possession of that Countrie, and the Iles adjoyning. But fuch predifpolition of Kingdomes and Provinces, is lightly comptrolled by the divine Providence, which therein shewes It felfe not (as Herodotus falfly termes it, and like an Atheist) envious or malicious, 20 but very just and majesticall; in vp-holding that vnspeakable greatnesse of Soucraignetic, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

raignetie, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadiadours that Philip fent, sell into the Roman bands, in their journic towards Himibal: and being examined what they were, adventured ypon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessive. These newes were so wellcome, that the joy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquirie. So they were louingly seasted; and friendly dismissed, with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to auxide the Carthaginan. But they being thus instructed concerning their journie, fell wilfully into the 40 campe of Humibal: who entertained them after a better sashion; and concluded the businesses, and the same and the same and the same as the same and the same and the same as the same and the same and the same as the same and the same as the same and the same as the same as the same and the same as the same the businesse, about which they came, you the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe valuekily to bee descried by the Roman sleet; which, mistrusting them to bee of the Carthagmian partie, gaue them chace. They did their best to have escaped: but being over-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it againe. That having beene sent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthagmians lying betweene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Prevor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now less credible than before: 50 and (which matred all) Gisca, Boslar, and Mage, with their followers, Carthagmians close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest fold for bond-slaues. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedom of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speede; concluding, as was agreed before; only with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavie weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their (houlders were ouer burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke anoble resolution; and suteable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beaten upon them from Spaine. They judged it more casie, with small 10 forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their ftrength to relift him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Mace. don, joyning with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegeance not only of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies that held all priviledges of the Citic, it will appeare by the following fucceffe of things. CM. Valerius the Pretor, with twentic Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian: and to fet on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles alreadie therein begunne. Philip was buse about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, fetting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling vpon Oricum; which he wanne, and foreturned to Apollonia againe. The E- 20 pirets craued helpe of M.Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans; of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no fulpition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and fent thence a thouland men, under Namus Criffus an under-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with so great saughter, that they forced him to for sake his camp, and raise the fiege. The King purposed (as it is said) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleet from Oricum, flopped vp the mouth of the River; 30 fo that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than lone botes) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Atolians, a Nation alwaies enemie to the Crowne of Macedon: and easily perfwaded them (being so affected, as hath elsewhere beene showed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promifed them great affiliance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Atolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promife, as if alreadie it had beene his owne. So a league was made betweene them : and afterward folemnely published at Olympia, by the Etolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Atolia to Coreyra, 40 in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrie should bee subdued, and left vnto the Etolians; the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision, to hold no longer, than whilest he abstained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the only point, whereat Valerius aimed: who promifed as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, volciffe it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this League was place referred for the Lacedemonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which raigned at Pergamus, in 50 Asia the lesse, a Prince hereaster much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they fought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Affociates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to give it countenance, than for any

readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Atolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet awhile the only men, of whom the Roman Generalls must make much ; as the late French King , Henrie the fourth, when he had only the title of 2 yanarre, was faid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto the Etolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infest the Kingdome of Masedon; wasted the Countrie about Oricem and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessalie, whence hee made to thew as if he would inuade Etolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to flirre vp all the Greekes adjoyning, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detefted as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrie. To which purpose, and to hinder the Atolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perfess his sonne and heire; with foure thousand men, vpon their borders; with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him . He made a long journie into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Mucedon, whenfocuer the King was absent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could again the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemics, and winne their little Countrie, ere hee should becable to returne. Hereto it 20 much availed, that the Romans had alreadic taken Oeniada and Naxos, Acarnantan Townes, conveniently lituated to let in an Armie; and configned them vnto the Atolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the flout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) every Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrie; together with the great hafte of the Macedonian (who laied aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Atolians to for sake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given ouer, the Romans and Etolians fell vpon Anticyra, which they tooke : the Romans affailing it by Sea ; the Atolians by Land. The Atolians had the Towne; and the Romans the Spoile.

10 fent in his fleed, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Asia came ouer to affift the Atolians. Hee was chiefly moved, by his owne jealousie of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanitie, of being chosen by the Atolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which Artalus and the Romans had fent, being joyned with the maine power of Etolia. Philip tried the fortune of two battailes : and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome Neighbours desired peace of him; and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadours, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intollerable 40 conditions, as ill beseemed vanquished men to offer; and might therefore well tefific, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being belieged in their owne Townes, that had made them delirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a Garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupactus, wasted the Countrie in a tertible braucrie: wherein Philip requited them; comming upon them in hafte from the Aemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and fending them fafter away, but nothing richer, than they came.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius

In the heat of this contention, Prusses King of Bithynia, searing the growth of Attalus, no less than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Nauie into Greece, to affist the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthagnians: and vyon greaterreason; as being more interested in the success of his affisiers. Philip was too weake by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships; yet the Vessels were fuch, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vie the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late : which might better at first have kept those Enemies from faltning vpon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could ferue to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowells of that Countrie. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in affailing their Towne, Hee was encountred by the Etolian and Roman Garrison; which draue him back with some loffe. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had received no great detriment, in 10 his retrait from Elis: rather he had given testimonic of his personall valour, in figh. ting well on foot, when his horse was slaine under him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentic thousand head of Cattaile, which they had brought together into a place of fafetic, as they thought, when their Countrie was inuaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sieyon, his horse running haltily vnder alow tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which ( after the falhion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Atolian; who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well known; and the tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an vprore : and not only the 20 Borderers, readic to fall vpon the Countrie, but some Captaines of Philip, casily corrupted; who thinking to make themselues a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home; leaving not three thousand men, to affilt his friends the Acheans. Hee also tooke order, to have Beacons creeked; that might give him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom hee meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-fauouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubæa, where one Plater betraied to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe it; where also the ftrong Citie of Chalcis was likely to have beene loft, if hee had not come the fooner. 20 He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citic of Opus. This Citic, lying ouer against Eubæn, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vied. Now because the Roman fouldiers had defrauded him in the fack of Oreum, and taken all to themselues: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilest he was busie, in drawing as much monie as he could out of the Citizens: the fuddentidings of Philips arrivall, made him leave all behinde him, and runne away to the Sca-side, where he got aboord his ships; finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this mifadventure; or tidings of Prusas the Bithynian his invasion upon the Kingdome of 40 Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without flaying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recouered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonos, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more braueric than importance, against the Etoitans. In the meane season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedamon, had beene busic in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was retur-

The Lacedemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Agypt, went about to choose two new Kings; and to conforme themselves to their old manner of Goussiacmant. But their chate was fo farre out of tune, that their hope of redresting things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnfortunate, than had beene 50 their attempts of reconering a large Dominion abroad. Lyourgus a Tyrantrole vp among them : victo whom succeeded this Machanidas; and shortly after came Nabi, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Atolian and Roman side, for feare of the Acheans; that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedamonian. But of these wee shall peake more hereafter. Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of affurance to that Countrie; spake braue wordes to the Assembly of their States, faying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre hyrunning away. He told how he had followed them to Chaleis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them; fuch haste they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, He faid, was not alwaies prosperous: He should one day light upon them; as ere this hee fundric times had done, and still to their olofe. The Achaians were glad to heare these wordes; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deedes acccompanying them. For he restored vnto their Nation fome Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewife to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, He rendred Aliphera. The Dymans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and fold for flaues, He fought out, ranformed, and put in quiet pollethon of their owne Citie. Further, pathing ouer the Corinthian Guife, Hee fell you the Atolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their frongest holds; and wasted their Countrie. This done, Hee tooke leave of the Acheans : and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them fo well, that they rested searclesse of any threatning danger. Then had heleifure to make warrevpon the Dardanians, ill Neighbours to Acceden: with whom neuertheleffe he was not fo farre occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himselfe

Master of the Sea; the Romans (fince the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lav.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make strong warre vpon the Atolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans; either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates; or some feare of danger at home, when Afdrubal was readie to fall vpon Italie; caused them to give 10 over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Atolians therefore, being driven to great extremitie, were faine to fue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what ever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fine Gallies, came ouer ingreat haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Atolia, hee turned aside to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him battaile: but he refused it; and suffering the Matedonians to waste the Countrie round about, before his eies, kept himselfe close with 40 in the walls of Apollonia; making some Ouertures of peace; which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not fo great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in cuill part the demeanour of the Cartheginians. For notwithstanding the Royall offer that be made them, to serve their turne in Italie, and affilt them in getting their hearts defire, before he would expect any requitall : they had not fent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, orto free his coast from the Roman and Atolian Pyracies. Only once they came to his helpe, which was, at his last journic into Achia. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: bauing done nothing; and pretending feare of to being taken by the Romans, euen at fuch time as Philip, with his owne Nauie, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This rechlesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore sceme to have beencone of Hanno histricks; whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly; to heare, that so great a King made offer to serue in person vnder

Hannibal, and required the affiltance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at his pleasure. Therefore hee had reason, such as Enuie could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vinto a safe and thriftie course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres fo mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges; and seede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it ferue to terrific the Romans, and compell them to fend partof their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should to the Roman Armies be leffened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be viged vinto the profecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthagimans to little or no charges; yea fcarce to the labour of giving him thankes. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within a while bee at the denotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie fhould be free, fo as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints ynto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner. to fulfill his will and pleafure, in doing fuch injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no leffe impudent, in ful- 20 filling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellowes, were fuch as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his advice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in that little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee begunne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainely given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselvies alreadie : and when the Romans desired his friendthip, as might be thought; for very feare of him; with reputation enough and 30 not as a forfaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessitie, He might give over the warre, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For hee had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and hee vnable to manageit. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them; when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeare following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or source Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macelonian, and therefore per- 40 haps inferted into the couerants, that formewhat might feeme to have been gotten. On the other fide, the Atintanes were appointed to returne under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countrie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not give peace, as they would feeme to have done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their loffe.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Baotsans, Thestalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman fide were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Per- 50 gamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nahis, the Tyrant of Lacedemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Atolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, sollowers of the Etolians, (and by them, asis most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much vpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the fetting downe of their name in this Treatie, ferued the Romans to good purnote: forafmuch as they were a busic people; and ministred occasion to renew the Warre, when meanes did better ferue to follow it.

d. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recover their frength by degrees. The noble affe-Etion of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-weale.

T was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing fo many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues : and wasted more men and monie to no purpofe, than would have ferued (if good order had beene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour an had beene the leffe harmefull, if their care of Italie had beene fuch as it ought. But they fuffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeare to yeare, caused as great opportunities tobe loft, as a Conquerour could have defired. The death of Pofibumius, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracufe; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole He of Sicil; as alfo that Warre, of which we last Spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so nearely after their terrible ouerthrow at Canna, among fo many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue funke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeare, yet 20 at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to bedoubted, that even this divertitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, adminiftred matter vnto Hanno, or fuch as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie : yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their feuerall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been throughlyprofequated: though it flood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Halian warre; should have beene strengthned; what socue had become of the rest. But the slen-40 der troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they fent, to vp hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was alreadie well neare beaten downe; their triffling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastic catching at Sicil: litle descrued to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, confidered apart by it felfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, T hat the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allega-tions would not serve to content Hannibal; then must be patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with to fo much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatfocuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necesfitie; to feede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about 20la, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Armic in an hard siege, that was to be referred for a worke of more importance. Many offers hee made vpon Nola; but alwaies with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battaile with him there : yet vider the very walls of the Towne; having the affiltance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman fide, fince the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight loft; which was no great meruaile; his forces being then divided, and imploied in fundrie parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in those daies, a strong Citie: and required a yeares worke to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest defire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the Towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They fent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a so. 19 lemne facrifice of the Nation, where they would confult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made thew to entertaine; but privily fent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracebus the Roman

The fift Booke of the fuft part

Gracehus was a very good man of warre; and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately flaine by the Gaules: after whole death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at leaft they fai- 20 ned to to have done: because this was the first time, that ever two Plebeian Confuls were chosen together. Marcelliu therefore gaue over the place : and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superflition : wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracehus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemie in field; yet intentiue to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had been earmed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, Hee continually trained : and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exercises of warre; than to keepe 30 it from quarrells, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base

Whilest the Conful was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cume sent him word, of all that had passed betweene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracehus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citic were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hame, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with fourteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any dan- 40 ger that might interrupt it; but rather deniling how to surprise others, than searing himselfe to be affailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, iffued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights service. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and flew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loofing not about an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tartied not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, He escaped agreater lose, than he had brought youn the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hama; forthwith he marched to thither: hoping to finde those yong fouldiers, and slaves, busied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the bootie But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for defire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal affailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes spent, about this Towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it : which they brought close vnto the walls ; thinking thereby to force an Entric. But the Defendants, on the infide of the wall, raifed against this an higher Tower: whence they made refistance; and found meanes at length, to confume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buffe in quenching the fire; the Romans, fallying out of the Towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their Trenches, with the flaughter of about fourteene hundred. The Conful wifely founded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibel in a readineffe to requite their feruice. Neither would He, in the pride of this good successe, adventure forth against the Enemie; who presented him battaile the day following, neare vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, feeing no likelihood to prevaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the fiege; and returned to his old Campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabiss the other Conful had taken the field; fome fmall Townes were recovered by the Romans, and the people severely punished for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Armic was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yeilded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hanmbal, attending the supplie from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it felfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of warre : and , in stead of ma-20 king (as formerly he had done) a generall inuation vpon the whole Country, to paffe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemie, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samuites was grieuoufly wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabine the Conful; when Hannibal having followed Marcelliss to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Apulia, These people shewed northe like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soucreigntic. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by fuch as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they 30 ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more easie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Confulfhip: and ioyned with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honous the yeare before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Sheild; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon inft reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie stood of able Comman-40 ders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made; served to put the Campans in searc, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To preuent this, Hannibal at their earnest entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, having with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to have wonne it. The Garrison in Puteeli was fixe thou fand ftrong: and did their duetic fo well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good fuccesse, could onely shew his anger upon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill fucceffe as before) affaied Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherin he had verie great intelligence. 50 Whilest he was in his progresse thither : Hanno made a journie against Beneuentum: and T. Greechus the last yeares Conful, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battaile. Hanne had with him about seventeene thousand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part : besides twelve hundred Horse; verie few of Ttttt which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moores. He held the Roman worke foure houres; ere it could be perceitted, to which side the victoric would incline. But Gracehus his fouldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed flaues, had received from their Generall a peremptorie denunciation; That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their libertie, bringing enery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of libertie was so greatly defired, that none of them teared any danger in earning it : howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the flaine Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the feruice, by imployment of fo many hands, in a worke fo little concerning the victorie. Gracehus therefore finding his owne errour, wisely corrected it : proclayming a- 10 loude, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting of any more; for that all should have libertie immediatly after the battaile, if they wanne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong vpon the Enemie; whom their desperate surie had soone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what hee could, and pressed so hard vpon the Roman battaile, that foure thousand of the slaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracehus had threatned before the battaile, vnto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired vnto a ground of strength: yet was he glad at length to faue himselfe by slight, when the Grosse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedie the losse. Leauing the field, hee 20 was accompanied by no more than two thouland : most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his fouldiers that reward of libertie, which hee had promifed: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the warres, they should neither eate nor drinke other wise than standing, vnleffe fickenesse forced them to breake his Order. So the victorious Armiereturned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchifed fouldiers were feasted in publike by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, & all of them having their heads couered (as was the custome of slaves manumised) with Caps, or white wools. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthic of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in 20 a Table by Gracehus, in the Temple of Libertie; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battaile, worthie of great note, which the Carthaginians had loft fince the comming of Hannibal into Itali: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracehus before at Hame, being things of small im-

Thus the Romans through industrie, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canne. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any furplulage, that might be exchanged for other 40 needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doc than before; as living vpon the same Trade, and subject to the same inconveniences, which enseebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeild great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armics, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Commonwealth fultained, and could now doe least for his Countrie, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised upon them by the poll, yet must it be farrelesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently confidering the greatnes of the war within the bowels of Italie, that 50 could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia flood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Maccionium, readie to land in the Eafterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the colt to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Adubah, to follow his brother outer the Alpez, as foone as he could rid himselfe of the Sepuis in Spaine; and the ponertie of the Common wealth, which had not monie for any one of these mortall dangers: were driven almost even to extreme want of counfaile. But being viged by the violence of fwith necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Sepios from Spaine; they resolved who the but being the second of the could be the weightight.

They called the people to Affembly : wherein Q. Fulzins the Pretor laide 10 open the publique wants; and plainely faid, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of monie for victuaile, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needefull to the Souldiers: but that fuch as had stuffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntill the Warre were ended. Hereunto hee so esfectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Reuennues, that the charge was under-taken by private men; and the Armic in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortlyafter this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus the Roman Cenfors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentine to the cor-20 rection of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They beganne with L. Cacilius Metellus: who, after the battaile at Canna, had held difcourfe with some of his companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had beene no better than loft. After him they tooke in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Cinna, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themfelues thereof fufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiuesnames. All thefe were now pronounced infamous by the Cenfors: as also were a great many more; euen who foeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes 20 appointed. Neither was the note of the Cenfors at this time (as otherwise it had vied to bee) hurtfull only in reputation : but greater weight was added there-so appointed. Neither was the note of the Ceniors at this time (as otherwise it had vide to bee; hurtfull only in reputation: but greater weight was added therevento, by this Decree of the Senate following; That all fuch as were noted with infame by thefe Cenfors, finald bee transported into Sicil, there to ferme entitl the end of the Warre, under the fame hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Reminder of the Armic beaten at Canna. The Office of the Cenfors was; to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to see notes of displace (without burther punishment) vpon those, whose vnhones or vnseemely behaviour fell not within compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publike Horses of 40 feuice, vnto fuch as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their mifbehauiour. Generally, they had the ouer-fight of mens lues and manners; and their confure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was themosft that they could doe) causing them to pay fome Duties to the Treasfurie, from which others were exempted. But befides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publike Workes; as mending of high waies, bridges, and water-courses, the reparations of Temples, Porthes, and such other buildings. If any man encroched ypon the streets, highwaies, or other places that ought to bee common; the Censors compelled him to yo make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Cultomes, and other publike Reuennues, to farme: to that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding who this Office; as maintayning themselues by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conferre the dignitic of the Senate; the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Cenfors; which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impourrished by warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of Cultomes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themfelues much with pervling the Temples, or other decaied Places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet for bore they to fet any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generolitic of the Romans. They that had beene accustomed, in more happie times, to vndertake such peeces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as it there had beene no such 19 want: promiting liberally their coft and trauaile; without expectation of any paiment, before the end of the warre. In like fort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had beene enfranchifed by Gracehus, were very well contented to forbeare the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as every one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quæstor kept a booke, of all that was laied out for the fustenance of these Widdowes and Orphans: whilest the whole stock was vsed by the Citic. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: fo that (the poorer fort ex- 20 cepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercinaries, that did accept it, when their countrie was in fo great want.

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; veelded halfe so much commoditie, as might bee laied in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse if wee consider thinges aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom shee forth-with under-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained, ere the yongest of those men was dead, whose names wee haue alreadic mentioned. For by this 20 hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and folide : and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citic of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to alhes, and taken from euery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which refled in the common happinesse of the valuersalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State whose dimension or ftemme is small, may aptly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchie : which chiefly comes to paffe, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside, and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his countrie. Hereof I might say, that our Age bath scene a great example, in the vnited Provinces in the Netberland; 40 whose present riches and strength, grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or allmost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilest the Generalitie was oppressed by the Duke of Ava; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industrie, and straining themselues to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthie, strong at Sca, and able to wage great Armies for their fernices by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at fuch a rate as we ought, the patient Resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, about all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly fay, That the Citie was neuer in greater-likelihood to prosper. Nei- 50 ther can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason have been more deare unto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with fenfualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subjects of Rome, could have believed their owne interest to be as great, in those wars which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consists: the Empire, founded upon so great vertue, could not have been throunke downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But with all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though hee hath given vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their to times appointed.

A. XIIII.

The Remansivinne fome Townes back from HANNIBAL HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The fiege of Capua. Two victiories of HANNIBAL to the gates of Roma. Capua taken by the Romans.

S the People of Rome strained themselves to the vtmost, for maintayning the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industric, in seeking to recouse what had been clott. The Towne of Cassimo, Fabius besieged. It was well desended by the Cartle ginin Garrison; and likely to have been relieved by those Scapus, if Murcellus from

Nolahad not come to the affistance of his Colleague: "Neuerthelesse the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: faying, that the enterprise was not great; yet and inicult, as athing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrarie opinion. He faid, That many fuch things, as were not at first to 20 haue beene under-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee profequited vito the best effect. So the siege held on : and the Towne was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craued parlee; offering to give it vp, fo as all might have leave to depart in fatetie, whither they pleafed. Whilest they were thus treating of conditions : or whilest they were isluing forth, according to the composition alreadic made; (for it is diuerfly reported) Marcellus, scizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to fword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Confui: wo faued them, and fent them to Capua in fafetie; all the reit were either flaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserved commendations, by hol-40 ding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as scaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fathion, with some aquiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like fort was Mount Marfam in Gascoigne taken by the Marshall Monlue, when I was a yong man in France. For whilest he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their feuerall guards, vpon hastic desire of being acquainted with the conditions propofed. The Marshall therefore discourring a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado; and put all faue the Gouernour vnto the fword. Herein that Gouernour of Mount Mar fam committed two groffe errours; the one, in that hee gaue no or-50 der for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for affurance given and received. Some fuch ouer-fight, the Couernour of Casiline seemeth to have committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monlue, was very honourable. When this worke was ended, many fmall Townes of the Samnites, and fome of the Lucans and Apalians, were recovered; wherein were taken, or flaine, about five and twentie thouland of the Enemies; and the Countrie grieuoully waited by Fabius, Marcellus lying fick at Nola.

**Ramibal** in the meane while was about Trientum**, waiting to heare from those, that had promifed to give up the Towher. But 'Mt Valerius', the Romen Propretor, had thrult so many men into it; that the Traitors durit not fittre. Wherefore the Carthagnian was faine to depart; having wearised himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrie; but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintring place; and beganne to victualle it, when Sommer 10 was but halfe pass. It is said, that he was in lone with a yong Wench in that towne: in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than other wise needer equired, He did not like the Romans; whom necessitie enforced, to make their Sommer last as long, as they were able to travaile vp and downe the Countrie.

About this time beganne great troubles, in Sicil, whither Marcellus the Conful was sent, to take such order for the Pronince, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulting, we will speake hereafter.

The new Confuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Conful, and T. Sempronius Gracehus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike feruice, to imploy often times their bestable men : and therefore made 20 it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabrus became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meet him : cleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Con(ul, fuffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse back; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it : who thereupon bad the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conful on his feet. The father chearefully did fo; faying, It was 30 my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to bee Conful. Caffins Attinius a wealthic Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battaile at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Towne, feeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Conful Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him, if he might bee therefore well rewarded. The Conful purposed to followold examples : and to make this Altinius a patterne to all Traitors, vling him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done those, that offered their vnfaithfull service against the Falisci, and King Pyrrhus. But 2. Fabius the father, was of another opinion : and faid, it was a matter of dangerous confequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee 49 should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; until they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not forrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather seuere, than couctous, He sent for the wife and children of Altinius into his campe: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about hisriches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aliue; and tooke all their goods vnto himfelfe. Fabius the Conful fhortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalado, in a 50 stormic and rainic night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust formult by the Carthaginian Garrison, when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the fouldiers held the townsmen fuspected; suspected; and therefore thought it no wisedome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little relistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had beene betraied by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In processe of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Conful: and receiving his faith for fecuritie of the Towne, prefently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding; like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good relistance. For when almost a thouland of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and ferue on the Roman iide; it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered 10 to paile forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed : and fo Arps became Roman againe; with little other loffe, than of him that had betraied it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors : and vnto Cneius Fuluius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their feruice; vpon no other condition, than to have their goods restored vnto them, when their Citie should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it ferued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times, and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mightie succours, that had beene promised from Carthage. The 20 Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, that had yeelded themfelues to Hannibal; returned againe to their old allegeance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himfelfe a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some pettic exploits in forraging the countrie, was flaine by Hanne, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if hee could take, it feemed that it would fland him in good flead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Mucedon, which his Carthaginians failed to fend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his defire to paffe; and being loth to hazard his forces, where hee hoped to prenaile by intelligence: He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore Townes of the 30 Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassador, practifing with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conucighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his companie were the next day fo closely purfued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they suffered death, as Traitors. By reason of this crueltic, or feueritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generallyand earneftly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discourred. Wherefore they sent agains to Hannibal: and ac-40 quainting him with the manner of their plot, made the fame composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, yied much to goe forth of the Towns on hunting by night; asifthey durst not take their pleasure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they miffed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their handes, that they might not feeme to have been abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies journie to Tarentum, if hee should haue marched thither with his whole Armic. This caused his long abode in one place the leffe to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure. He caufedit to be given out, that he was fick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were 50 growne carelesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their bufinesse in order; He tooke with him ten thousand, the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before breake of day, made all speede thitherward. Fourescore light

couered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouernour, when he heard tell in the cuening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet diflodged; and gaue order, that fome companies thould be fent out the next morning, to ftrip them of their bootie, and fend them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arrivall: Nico, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was readic. Prefently Nico beganne to fet vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whiffling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make hafte, for that hee had 'alled a great Bore, so heavie, that scarce two men could stand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two yong men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to bee worthie the looking on. While the Porter flood wondring at the largeneffe of the beaft, Philomenes ranne him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, sell vpon all the watch; whom when he had flaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring T4rentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met, Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Ro- 20 mans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vprore : but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was viskilfully founded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that flood in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might eafily perceine the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vinderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inueighed bitterly against 30 the Romans, as tyrannous oppreffors; and spake what else he thought fit for the prefent. This done; and having gotten fuch spoile as was to bee had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, He addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fallie out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them voable to defend the Peece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he beganne to make his approches, the Romans in a brauerie fallying forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst aduenture. Then gaue Hannibal a figne to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose : and fiercely setting vpon the Enemie, draue him back with great 40 flaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not iffue forth. The Gitadell flood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was joyned by a cawsey. This cawley Hannibal intended to fortifie in like fort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few daies went fo well forward, without impediment from the belieged, that he conceined hope of winning the Peece it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readie all forts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his workes, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which tooke away all hope of prenailing; and made him returne to his 50 former counsaile. Now for a fmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Hauen, and could not passe forth, whilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the Towne would fuffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea; whilest the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be relieued, and enabled to hold out. Againft this intonuenience, it was rather withed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Hauen; to guard the mouth of it, and out of tall fupply from the Enemie. Tannihal told them, that this might well be done; for that their Towns flanding in plaine ground, and their firects being faire and broad, it would be ene hard matter to draw the Gallies: our Land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he undertooks and effected; whereby the Roman Garrison was reduced into great pecoffice; schough wish much patience is held out, and found Hamibal often-times other wife buffed; than his, after required.

Thus with mutuall loffe on both fides, the time passed; and the Roman forges. growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaceus, with Appress Claudius, lately chosen. Confuls, prepared to beliege the great Citle of Caputa. Three and twentie Legions: the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hadie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse at Game a had reduced them. But to fill vp thefe Legions, they were faine to take vp yong Boyes, that were vnder feuenteene yeares of age; and to fend Commissioners about fiftie miles round, for the seeking out of fuch Lads as might appeare feruiceable, and preffing them to the warrest making yet a Law, That their yeares of feruice, whoteunce they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning oo fo yong, as if they had beene of lawfull age. Before the Koman Armie drew neare, the Campans felt great want of victualles, as if they had alreadic beene beligged. This happened partly by floth of the Nation, partly by the great waite and fpoile. which the Romans had in foregoing yeares made vpon their grounds. They fent therefore Embassadours to Hannibal's desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to bee shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable wordes: and fent Hanne with an Armic to Supply their wants. Hanne popointed them a day : against which they should be readie with all manner of carriages, to flore themselves with victuailes, that he would provide. Neither did he ptomife more than he performed. For heccaused great quantitie of graine, that had beene laied up in Cities 20 round about, to be brought into his campo, three miles from Benever town in Thicheir at the time appointed came no more than fortio Garrant Wagons, with a few packs horses; as if this had been enough to victualle Copur. Such was the rachiesnesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angricherest; and told them they were world than very beafts; fince hunger could not reach them to have areater garger Wherefore hee gave them a longer day; againfl which hee made providion to flore them throughly. Of all the fedoings word was lent to the Reman Confule from the Git tizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Kulking the Conful, taking with him fitch fireigth as hee thought needfull for the fernice, cameinto Beneuemamby night? where with diligence he made inquirie into the beliaujour of the linemie. Helear-40 ned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gope abroad to make prouitions; that fometwo thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Variets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept all thought being fet vpon agreat Haruest. Hereupon the Conful bade his men prepare themselves, to affaile the Enemies campe; and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, He marched thitherward fo early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so ynexpected, Hee had well neare forced the campe on the fudden. But it was very fireing, and very well defended : for that the longer the fight continued, the lefte defire had Fulying to lodge more of his men in the attempt; feeing many of them caft away; and yet little hope of doing, 50 good. Therefore he faid, that it were better to goe more leifurely and inblantially to worke; to fend for his fellow-Conful with the rest of their Arming and to lie betweene Hanno and home; that neither the Campans Goodld depart though, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieve them. Being thus discourling, and shout to found the retrait; bee faw, that some of his mon had notten querthe Enemies Rampart.

There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the fouldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore some Enfigne-bearers threw their Enfignes over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnleffe they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominie, than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers aduenture fo desperately; that Fuluus, perceiving the heat of his men, changed purpose, and encouraged those that were formewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had alreadic gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne : in which were flaine aboue fixe thousand; and taken, about seven thousand; besides all the store of victuailes. and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Ro- to man Confederates. This misaduenture, and the nearer approch of both the Confuls, made them of Capus fend a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the love, that he was wont to protest vnto their Citie; and how he had made shew, to affect it no leffe than Carthage. But now, they faid, it would be lost, as Appr was lately, if he gaue not ftrong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable wordes; and fent away two thousand horse, to keepe their grounds from spoile; whilest hee himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adjovning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarantines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and, being ouer-taken, fuffered death for their attempt; were some of 20 the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greekes, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italte, which was called of old Magna Gracia. These people tooke to heart the death of their Hostages; and thought the punishment greater, than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, vpon the like reason: had not some companies laine in their Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to mafter. Neuertheleffe they helped themselves by cunning : inuiting to their gates Hanne and Mage, that were neare at hand: against whom whilest they proffered their feruice to Atinius, the Roman captaine, they drew him forth to fight; and re- 20 coyling from him, closed up their gates." A little formalitie they vsed, in pretending feare, left the Enemie should breake in together with the Romans; in fauing Atmius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practife) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, eafily prevailed in the reft; and delinered up the Towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilest the Confuls, fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves voto the siege of Capua.

Many difafters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprife. T. Som- 40 proning Grachus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been twice Gonful, was flaine either by recheric of some Juscaus, that drew him into an ambush; or by some Carthaginian straiglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honorably interred, either by Hamubla himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hamubla stortis. He was appointed to lie in Benezentam, there to sective the back of the Armiethat should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that businesse. The Volome, or Slaues lately manumided, 'storsolve their Ensigness, and wont energy one whither hee thought good, as if they had beene discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seek them our, and bring them back into their campe. Neuerthe-selfethe Confuls went forward with their worke; and drawing enere to Capua, did all acts of hostilitie which they could. "Mage the Carthaginian", and the Citizens of Capua, wade them an hard welcome; wherein aboue fifteen e hundred Roman were lost. Neither was it long, ere Hamubla 'Emmethither: who sought with the Confuls.

and had the better; infomuch that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went seuerall waies: Fuluius toward Cuma; Claudius, into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who having led him a great walke, fetcht a compaise about, and returned to Capua. It so fellout, that one M. Centenius Penula a Stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hannibal refled, when hee was wearie of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trufted with the leading of fine thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue 10 of any good Souldier; how meane soeuer his condition were. Wherfore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand; and he himselfe, being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp fo many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betweene a front Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellowes were all (in a manner) flaine; scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fulnius, a Roman Pretor with eighteene thousand men, was in Apulia, very careleffe, and a man infufficient for the charge which he held. Thither he therefore hafled, to visit him : hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces and about vinder men of fmall abilitie. Comming vpon Fuluius, He found him and his men fo jollie, that needes they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee bestowed Alago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambulh. Then offering battaile to Fuluius, Hee soone had him in the trap: whence hee made him glad to escape aline; leaning all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead behinde him. These two great blowes, received one presently after the other, much assonished

the Romans. Neuerthelesse all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Confuls should goe substantially forwards with the 20 fiege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate downe before the towne : and C.Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Sueffula to their affiltance. They made Proclamation, That who focuer would iffue forth of Capua before a certaineday prefixed, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that vinto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the fuccours attended from Hannibal. Before the citie was closed vp, they fent Messengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brundusium. He had made a long journie, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citadell : of which expectation failing, He tur-40 ned to Brundusium; vpon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans methim; told him of their danger with earnest wordes; and were with wordes as braue recomforted. He bad them confider how a few daies fince he had chased the Confuls out of their fields; and told them, that we would prefently come thither againe, and fend the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answere the Meffengers returned : and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily denoted vnto his friendship, would hold out along time: and thereby give him leifure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italie; whilst the Roman armie spent it to felfe in a tedious fiege. Thus he lingred; and thereby gaue the Confuls time, both to fortifie themselues at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whileft he himfelfe pursued hopes, that never found successe.

Claudius and Fuluius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the flege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The townes-

men often fallied out : rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect : the Enemie lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was eafily beaten) the Romans vied to thrust out fome troups, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercises the Campans vibally had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who fcorned to take foile at the hands of fuch Rebells. It was therefore deuifed, that fome active and couragious yong men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Velstes, having each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick upon to the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of service, they much disheart. ned in the maine. The time thus paffing, and famine daily increasing within the Citie; Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs. called Galatia, fell vpon their campe. At the fame time the Capuans iffued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuife: fetting all their multitude of vnferuiceable people on the walls; which, with a loud noise of Pannes and Bafons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appins Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuertheleffe, in purfuing them to their gates, He received a wound, that accompanied him in short space 20 after to his graue. 2. Fuluius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian Armic. The Roman campe was even at point to have beene loft and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or elfe (for the report varies) being some of them flaine vpon it, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in fuch fort, that their bodies ferued as a bridge vnto the Affailants. It is faid, that Hamibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could fpeake Latine well, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Confuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and slie betimes vnto the next Hills, for almuch as the campe was alreadic loft. But all would not ferue. The trand was detected: and the Armie, having fitten there fo long, had at 20 good leifure itrongly entrenched it felfe; fo as little hope there was to raife the fiege

This did extremely perplexe the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it felfe; and now his defire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-neare lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citic of Tarentum, were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vie; on the fudden he entertained an haughtierefolution, even to fet vpon Rome; and carrie to the walls of that proud Citie, the danger of warre that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to 40 draw the Roman Generalls, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Armie; then had be his desire: If they divided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despaire, that the terror of his comming might fo affonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citie. His only feare was, left the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had for saken them; and therupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemie. To prevent this danger, He sent letters to Capua by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitive into the Roman campe, conveighed himfelfe thence over the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The journie to Rome, was so to be performed with great celeritie: no small hope of good successe, resting in the fuddennesse of his arrival there. Wherefore he caused his men, to have in a readineffe ten daies victuailes; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the River of Vulturnus. This could not be done fo closely, but that the Roman Generalls by fome fugitives had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate: which was therewith affected, according to the diverlitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counfaile to let alone Capua, yea and all places elfe, rather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemic. Others were fo farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should judge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That, those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citie, would ferue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and fend him thence; if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded that letters should be sent to Fuluius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the prefent were in Rome: who, fince they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generalls at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull and if it might conveniently be, neither toraife their fiege, nor yet to put the Citie of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius tooke fifteene thou fand foote, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Armic: with which he hasted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudins, who could not travell by reason of his wound, to continue 20 the fiege at Capua.

Hannibal, having passed over Vulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might ferue to transport the Enemie, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hafted he away toward Rome; flaying no longer in any one place, then henceds must. Yet found he the bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more gricuously to spoile their lands, whiles the bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all fores and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, 30 one after another, into the Citie; fome few bringing true advertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were peftered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senatours were all in the great Market, or place of Assemblie, readic to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the middeft of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fuluius, with part of the Armie from Capus, was hasting to defence of the Citie. The Office of a Proconful did expire, at his returne home, and entrie into the Gates of Rome. Where-40 fore, that Fuluius might lose nothing by comming into the Citie in time of such need, an Act was passed, That He should have equall power with the Consuls, during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soone after another: Fuluius having beene long held occupied in passing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrey was able to give. The Confuls, and Fuluius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especiall order, against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne: whence He aduanced with two thousand Horse, and rode along a great way vader the walk; viewing 50 the fite thereof, and confidering how he might best approach it. But He either went, or (as the Roman Storic faith) was driven away; without doing, or receiving any hurt. Many tumults role in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. About the rest, one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon Vuuuu fome displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Confuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their feruice might be vicfull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the feburbe. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred fuch militaking, as caufed a great vprore among the people : all crying out, that Agentine was taken, and the enemie gotten within the wals. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth : and the streetes were so full of cattaile, and husbandmen, which were fledde thither out of the Viilages adjoyning, that the paffage was flopt vp: and the poore Namidians pittifully 10 beaten from the house-toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the gates, had it not beene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedie the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had beene Dictators, Confuls, or Confors, should have authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemie departed. The day following, Hannibal passed ouer Anien. and presented battaile to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertooke it. It is faid, that a terrible showre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their scuerall Camps: and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking vp, and clearing, as foone as they were departed afunder. Certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten daies prouision, could 20 not endure to flay there, vntill his victuals were all fpent. In which regard, the Romans, if they fuffered him to wall his time and prouitions, knowing that hee could not abide there long, did as became well-aduited men; if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is faid) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terrour of Hannibals comming to the Citie, how great focuser it was at the first, yet after some leifure, and better notice taken of his forces, which appeared leffe than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and foone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the fame time, the supplie appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipio's, was fent out of the towne, & went forthat one gate, whileft the Carthaginian lay before a 30 nother. In all Panish terrours, as they are called, wherof there is either no cause known or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedie, to doe somewhat quite contrarie to that which the danger would require, were it fuch, as men haue fallstoned it in their amafed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacific a foolish vprore in his Armie, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had fent the Affeinto the Campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appeares withall a great magnanimitie: whereby they fultained their reputation, and augmented it no leffe, than by this bolde attempt of Hannibal it might feeme to have beene diminified. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceipts of their Encmics, and taken away the difgrace of that feare, which clowded their valour at his first comming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that veric piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was folde in Rome: and foldeit was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This indignitie comming to his care, incenfed Hannibal fo much, that he made Fortfale of the Silver-fmithes shops, which were neare about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, then any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, whereon herai- 50 fed his Tent. But this counter-practife was nothing worth. The Romans did feeke to manifest that affurance, which they justly had conceined; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was alreadie past. His victuailes were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed vinto himselfe, this journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his campe: and doing what spoile he could in the Roman Territorie, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to begotten, He paffed like a Tempelt ouer the Countrie; and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fait that hee had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua hee gaue it lost : and is likely to have curfed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus difabled him to relieue that faire Citie; fince he had no other way to vent his griefe. O. Fuluius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who fo would yeeld, before a certaine day, might fafely doe it. This, and the very returne of 10 Fuluius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to viderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his owne cuill deserts, told him that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could only be found, how to convey fuch letters vnto him, as they would write, The carriage of the letters was undertaken, by some Numidians : who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne, into the Roman campe, wanted fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned, ere they could conveigh themfelius away, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the Towne; and the letters of Bostar and Hanno, were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus for fake the Capuans and them. For (faid they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoener they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armic be readie to attend them; and by taking of such course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canne. In fine. they befought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning an other way; as if it were his only care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view : promiting, to make a desperate fallic, if he would once more aduenture to let vpon the Roman camp. Such were the hopes of Bollar and his 30 fellow. But Hannibal had alreadie done his best : and now beganne to faint under the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partifans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. Links It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capus, had beene fent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were fo; justly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedilesse necessitie. Howsoever it were, the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is showed) into the Roman Proconfuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all fuch counterfait fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake 40 the hearts of the Campans: fo that the Multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding up of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeares since had beene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them inuited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them fuch an health, as should set them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemie fought vpon their bodies. About seuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lines together, by drinking poison. All the reft, hoping for more mercie than they had deferued, yeelded fimply to diferetion. 50 So one of the Towne-gates was fet open: whereat a Roman Legion with fome other companies, entring, difarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrifon , and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe. Attheir comming thither, the Proconfuls laid yrons voon them all : and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe Vuuuu 2 custodic:

custodie; some to Cales; others to Theanum. Touching the generall Multitude: they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vsed by Fuluins in the meanewhile, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersitie. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received : yet was hee not inexorable to the Campans; as having loued them well in former times, and having given his daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fuluius the more hastic intaking vengeance: for feare, left, vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common safetie, and honour of their state. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, and from thence to Cales : where hee caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to flakes, and foourging them first a good while with rods; after which he ftruck off their heads. This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Townes of Italie the leffeapt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans : and bred a general linclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman lide. The Mellans, Calatines, and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear, and want of abilitie to relift. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulnius: who dealt fo extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to let on fire fo many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to have been confumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualitie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any flaue, and other fufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out: and the Campans, being detected by a flaue of their owne (to whom, aboue his libertic promifed, was given about the summe of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their descrits. Fuluius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme scueritigeaused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be fet vnto their miferies. That whereupon the Senators resolued in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for flanes, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further defolation: but the generalitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto seuerall places, as best liked the angrie Victors. As for the Towne of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beautie and commodious fite: but no corporation, or forme of politic, was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Prouest was euerie yeare sent, to gouerne ouer those that should inhabitit. and to doe justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before : his oile being farre spent; and that, which should have revived his slame, being vnfortunately fhed: as shall be told in place convenient.

δ. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warre against the Romans in those slands; and were

Hilest things passed thus in Italie; the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happie end, by the industrious valeur of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and fudden: about thirtie thousand being vo in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppresse it. One Harlicor as with his fonne Hiostus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promifed the affiltance of his Countrie. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had beene directed vnto the profecution of that maine bulinesse in Italie; whereon this, and all other hopes depended. For it would have fufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from fending an Armie into Sardinia. Harficoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out 2. Mutius the Pretor; who lay sick 20 in the Pronince; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But whilest they sought reuenge of that particular injurie, whereof the sense was most grieuous: they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such; as may seeme to have discouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For where as they sent ouer Aldrubal, furnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armie; affifted in this Expedition by Hannothe Author of the rebellion, and by Margo a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neare kinsman to Hannibal : it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitic of foule weather was cast vpon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such euill 30 plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanguished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was fent from Rome with two and twentie thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Hand, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Confulfhip, It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and vp-hold in their severall Provinces. the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any injurie were done vnto the Prouincialls; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or what focuer accident required the affiftance of a Patron : the first Conqueror, and his race after 40 him, were the most readic and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence in enery Province. and had alwaics in readineffe fit men to reclaime their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not alreadie broken too farre out. Yet was Harficor as fo strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Marriners : without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twentie thousand, whereof we have spoken before : He landed at Calaris or Carallis. where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Countrie, and sought out the Enemie. Hyostus, the sonne of Harsteoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Aro mieleft vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrie, to draw in more friends to their fide. This yong Gentleman would needes adventure to get honor, by giving battaile to the Romans at his owne discretion. So hee rashly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible ouerthrow; and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyestus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manluss pursued them. Very soone after this defeature came Afdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia, in such halte as he might have done, if the tempelt had not hindred his voiage; yet foone enough, and firong enough to faue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebells. Manlius herevpon with-drew himselfe back to Calaris: where he had not staied long, ere the Sar. dimians (fuch of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craued his affiftance; their Countrie being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebells, with whom they had refused to joyne. This drew Manlus forth of Calaris: where if he had flaied a little longer, Afarabal would have fought him out with some blemish to his reputation. Ic But the fame of Afarabal and his companie, appeares to have been greater than was their strength. For after some trial made of them in a few skirmishes; Manlius adpentured all to the hazard of a battaile: wherein he flew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Foure houres the battaile lasted : and victoric at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Manders; whose courages had beene broken in their unprosperous fight, not many daies before. The death of yong Hyoftue, and of his father Harficorus, that flew himselfe forgriefe, together with the captivitie of Afdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hannothe Carthaginians; made the victorie the more famous. The vanquilhed Armie fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in fhort space wanne 20 the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman: who impoling vpon them fuch increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best forted with the nature of their severall offences, or their abilitie to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome; leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil: was of greater length, and every way more burdensometo Rome: as alfothe victoric brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only fauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrie; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enjoyed before. Sooneafter the battaile of Canna, the old King of Syracufe died: who 20 had continued long a fledfast friend unto the Romans; and greatly relieued them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeares of age; Gelo his fonne, that should have beene his heire, being dead before. To this yong King his successor, Hiero appointed lifteenetutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themisius; who had maried his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while; Andronodorus, waxing wearie of so many Coadjutors, beganne to commend the sufficiencie of the yong Prince, as extraordinariein one of his yeares; and faid, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of any Protector. Thus by giving over his owne charge, he caused others to doethe like : hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands ; which came to passe in a fort as hee defired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitic, it was only in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer feene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his fonne. But much more he offended them, when by his infolent behaulour, futable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in course of life, he would reviue the memorie of Tyrants dead long lince, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. Hee grew proud, 50 lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him : fo that such of his late Tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to line in banishment : the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe.

Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counfailers, but not of his Cabinet. Thefe, howfocuer they agreed in other points, were at fome diffension about that maine point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleafures, which was fet on change: but Thirafo, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as yet it remained fomewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline : a confpiracie against his Person, was detected by a groome of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; to thereby to wring out of him the whole practife, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing; but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, unto the extremitie of the torture; he confessed, that he had beene set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neare in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and neuer shrunke for the matter; affuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitic. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himfelfe, when Thrafo was taken out of the way, quickly refolued vpon fiding on with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wifer than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necefficie, had of late beene fuch, as might have beene termed excelling, were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein hee tooke order for his owne chate, that depended vpon theirs. But the yong Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off; regarded only the things prefent; the weakenesse of Rome; the prevalent fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laide out in vaine, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with hims that was maintained by Hippocrates & Epicides. 20 Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syraensian. These grew into fuch fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they lifted. So that when Appius Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweenethe People of Rome and the King of Syracule. his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymas would needes haue them tell him, the order of the fight at Canna; that hee might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe: saying . That he could hardly beleetie the Carthaginians; so wonderfull was the victorie as they reported it. Hauing thus dismissed the Romans, he fent Embassadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Domini-40 on; but afterward, that hee should raigne over all Sign; and the Carthoginians rest fatisfied, with what they could get in Italie. At these doings Ap. Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced youn them by neceffitie; and partly (as may feeme) for that the reputation, both of him felfe, and of his Citie, had received fuch blemish, by that which happed vnto him in his journie, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicil, and forbad him to looke hig. The money that Hiero had bestowed upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carrie back vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But 50 in fleed of returning the monie with thanks, as he had beene directed, and as it had beene notifed abroad that hee should doe; the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glorie, and fend word after him, that he should configue that monie over to Marcus Valerius; of whose voiage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly : and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed. from a glorious oftentation of the Roman magnanimitie; into fuch a pittifull tune of thanksgining, as must needes have bred forrow and commisseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of passime and scorne. in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resoluted how to beginne it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innovation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might have prospered more than ever. had it beene wifely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, 10 were fent about the Countrie with two thousand men; to follicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a Citic of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all hafte, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the sudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betweene him and his guard, ftrooke him dead. Forthwith libertic was proclaimed: and the found of that word fo joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their 20 Captaines; which wrought fo effectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Armie, as in detellation of his bad life, fuffered his carkaffe to lie vnburied. These newes, ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking the Kings horses, possed away; to signific all that had passed; to flirre vp the people to libertie; and to prepent Andronodorus, if he, or his fellowes would make offer to viurpe a Tyrannie. The Syracufians hereupon presently tooke Armes; and made themselues masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other fide fortified the Palace, and the Island : being yet vicertaine what to doe; betweene desire of making himselfe a sourraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was 30 the daughter of Hiere cherished him in his hopes; putting him in minde of that well knowne Proucrbe, which Dionysius had vied ; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horfe-back. But feare, and better counfaile preuailed fo farre; that Andronodorus, having flept vpon the matter; diffembled his affections, and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People : telling them; That hee was glad to fee, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, least they would not have contained themselves within bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that fince he beheld their order- 40 ly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their libertic perforce, but to wed it vnto th em for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendred vp the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had beene an cuill Mafter, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But fuch was his delire of Soueraignetie: and fo vehement were the infligations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practife with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercinaries : hoping to make himselfe strong, by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides, had beene with the Stracusian Pretors, and told them, that, being fent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according 50 to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he lived, what service they could; and that now they were defirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed and with a convoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and fet them fafe at Locri. This was calily granted: both for that the Syracufian Magistrates were well contented to earne thankes of Hannibal, with fuch a little curtefie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple; which were good fouldiers, and gratious with the Armie, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the delire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the bulineffe, for which Hannibal had fent them. Wherefore they infinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the armie with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitiues, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syraculians were come to agreenent. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great neede of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the fifter of Hieronymus, readie to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents; he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themislius, entring into the Senate, were flaine out of hand; and afterward accused to the People, of all the cuill which they had done, whileft Hieronymus liued, as by his authoritie; and now fince attempted, in feeking to viurpe the tyrannic themselves. It was also declared that the daughters of Hiero and Gele, were accessarie to this dangerous treason; and that the virguiet spirits of these women, would neuer cease to worke, virtill they had reconered those Royall ornaments, and Soueraigne power, whereof their familie was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo, were also condemned to die: and executioners prefently fent by the enraged people, to take away their liues, Demarata, and Harmonia, had perhaps descrued this heavie sentence; but Heradea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the haltie execution of this rash judgement. Her hufband Solippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to King Ptolemie, &c., he durst not returne home; but staied in £gypt as a banished man. This considera-20 tion, when it was too late, together with fome other pittiful accidents accompany ing the flaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning themselves) all cryed out you the authors of fo foule a butcherie. Being thus incenfed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger; they called for an eledion of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately flaine: meaning to fubflitute fuch in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a greatrowt, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of fouldiers that preffed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates; and the leffe that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more cager was the multitude; and by a generall 40 crie forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracufians and the Romans. But having striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in scare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicil; they gaue way vnto the time, and fuffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practife. The Leontines had some neede of a Garrison: and to them was fent Hippocrates the Pretor; attended, by fuch fugitiues, and mercinarie fouldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent 50 word vnto the Syracusians, that they had alreadic broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept fincerely, untill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Episides, fearing to fustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more defirous to fet forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracufians. For he faid, that fince they had all of late ferued one Master; there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was flaine, and libertic first proclaimed. Wherefore, fince they of Syracus were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leantines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the chaine, wher with both the one, and the other were bound : his aduice was. that fuch their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the league, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been 10 Subject to HIERO and HIERONYMVS, Should henceforth, be Vassals unto the state of Syracule. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noueltie of change, they had fit opportunitie to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had loft not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this craftie Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracustans. But seeing they had long since yeelded vnto Syracuse, and been subject vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather scasonable than just. Neuerthelesse the motion of Epicides was highly approued: in fo much that when meffengers came foone after from Syracufe, 20 to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone either to Local or whither elfethey lifted, fo that they stated not in Sieil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptorie answere, was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracufians: who offered him their affistance in doing justice vpon the Leontines their Rebells; with condition that when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better fatisfaction : but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand; which he dispatched in one 30 day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken : all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippoerates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night conneied themselves into the Towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captaines vsed after victorie; to fecke out the fugitive Roman flaves and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he tooke to mercie; for bearing also to strip or spoile them. But the same of his doings was bruted after a contrarie fort. It was faid, that he had flaine, Man, Woman, and Ghild, and put the Towne to fack. These newes met the Syracusian Armie vpon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercinaries 40 there were, that had beene sent forth of Syracuse, under Sosis and Dinomenes two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other Rebells. These Captaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrie: but the fouldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercinaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-fouldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene so cruelly butchered : and hereupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to bee angrie, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vinquiet thoughts another way, and fet them aworke in some place else: for as much as at Leonium there was no neede of their feruice. So toward Herbefus they marched: where lay 50 Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, deniling what further harmethey might doe; but now so weakely accompanied, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two bretheren were no leffe well aware : and therefore aduentured vpon a remedic litle leffe desperate desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbejus vnarmed, with olive branches in their hands, in manner of suppliants; and so presented themselues to the Armie. Sixe hundred men of Creete were in the vantguard; that had been well yled by Hieronymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hennibal; who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and louingly dismissed them. These Cretans therefore welcomed the two bretheren, and bad them be of good cheare; faying, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vie their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by feueritie; which would not ferue. For when they commanded thefe two Trattors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was fo violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates denifed a trick; whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the vicertaine case wherein he flood. He caused letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans; directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing ail to the fword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the Mercinaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offentiue, all of them in generall, to the libertic of the Citie, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfait Epiftle was openly rehearfed : the vprore was fuch, that Solis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to for fake the campe, and flie for the r lines. All the Syracufians remayning behinde, had been cut in pecces by the enrage d fouldiers, if the two artificers of the fedition had not faued their lines; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had served among the Leontines, to justifie the bruit of Marcellus his cruelcie; and to carrie home the newes to Syracufe, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not only the multi-ude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Towne with causelesse indignation. In 20 good time (faid fome) was the auarice and crueltic of the Romans detected: who, had they in like fort gotten into Syracufe, would have dealt much worfe; where their greedie appetites might have beene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discoursing, and denising how to keepe out the wicked Komans, Hip. poerutes with his Armie came to the gates; exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnleffe for want of helpe, they would be betraied to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wifest of the Senate, would faine have kept him out: but the violence of the fouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-ftrong furie of those within the Towne; that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediatelyfell vpon the Pretors; whom (being for faken by all men) he put to the fword, and 40 made flaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day he went openly to worke : and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue libertie to all flanes and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest fort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracu/.

When Marcellus was advertifed of this great alteration, beethought it no time for him to fit fill, and attend the further iffue. He fent Embaffadours to Syraes(L); that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chaled out as enemies. Then drew he eneare with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Towne, fint before him, fome to require a parlee. The were entertained without the walls by 50 the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Roman were come thither, not with purpofe to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syraes(Lows, which were oppreffed by Tyrans; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that the se worthie men, their Confederates, which were chafed out of the Towne, might be fusifiered to returne and enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had beene to him, he could have told what to fay to them: but fince it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; her told them, they should finde by experience, that to besiege Syracuje was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee fent them gone; and returned back into the Citie. Immediately beganne the fiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that follong a circuit of walls, as compaffed Syracufe, being manned with to no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom hee had lately dealt, would in fome part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neuertheleffe all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of premailing by open force. taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first affaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hallie victorie. But there lived at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hierothe late King, that was his kinsman. had framed fuch engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vie, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could have beene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiere, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were fome other earth, or place of fure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this bold affertion, he performed fome strange workes; which made the King entreat him to convert his fludie vnto things of vie; that might preserve the Citie from danger of enemies. To fuch Mechanical workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injurie done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propolitions, vnto the workemanlhip, and gaine, of bale handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed fome Geometricians; that feemed vnto him to profane their feience, by making it vulgar. Neither must wee rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austeritie, or affected fingularitie in his reprehension. For it hath beene the vnhappie fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published; and being once made knowne, to bee vnder-valued; as falling within compaffe of the meanest wit; and things, that every one, could well have performed. Hercof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different forts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and after it ) in a familiar and most homely example, we may fee most apparent proofe. He that lookes upon our Englifb Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke 40 it ridiculous to heare one fay, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from fome of an extraordinarie knowledge in natural Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the leffe, for that the labour of workmanship growes to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be faid of many handicrafts : and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wife men, grew after ward corrupted by those, to whom the practise fell; that is, by fuch, as could flubber things eafily oner, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doc good vnto mankinde, are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a 50 kinde of injustice, that the long travells of an understanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away upon men of no worth; or yeeld leffe benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere ftrangers; and perhaps his enemies. And furely, if the paffion of Enuic, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as have Anger, Feare, and other the like Affections : it is in some such cale as this; and ferueth against those, which would viurge the knowledge, wherewith God harn denied to endue them. Nanertheleffe if we have regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that every one ought to beare vinto the generalitie of mankinde, after the example of him that faffereth his Sunne to bine upon the init and uniust : it will appeare more commendable in wife men, to enlarge themfeines, and to publish wnto the world, those good things that Ive buried in their own bolomes This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed toit fome dangerous cunnings, that may beg peruerted by guill men to a in mischicuons vie. For it the secret of any rare Antidot, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecoverable powson; better it were, that such a jewell remaine close in the hands of a wife and bonest man; than being made common bind all men to vie the remedig, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended to very commendable ends. They were engins, feruing vito the defence of Syracufe; not fit for the Syraculians to carry abroad to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to we them but referred fo much to his own direction; that after his death more of the fame kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It fufficed vnto this worthy many that hee had approved, even vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the art of murdering men, it was belides his purpole.

Archimedes had fundric deuices; of which any one fort might have repelled the affaylants : but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heavie stones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. The seaffliched such as lay farre off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual voly of fliot, which 20 they could not endure. Some with an yron graple were taken by the prow and hoified up; shaking out all the men; and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange engins were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rockes; and all of them were so beaten, that they durst never come to any second assault. In like fort was the Land-armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the affault. For remedie hercof it was conceived, that if the Romans could earely before day get necre vnto the walls; they should be (as it were) under the point blanck, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which to were woond up hard to shoote a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the affavlants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them; and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great flaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to flav by it) cuen till they were gotten very farreoff. This did so terrifie the Romans; that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engins were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engins had stood you the walls, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by fome device, to make them vnfer-50 niceable. But all, or the most of them were out of fight; being erected in the streets behinde the walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to vie them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all provision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate peece of worke.

For the enemies having fo goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were fitting by Sea, Willing to Supply them were not likely fo foone to bee confumed with famine, as the beliegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before fo firong a Citle ; having no probabilitie to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most bonourable course.

In the meane while, Himiled, Admitalt of a Carthaginian fleet, that had waited long about Sitit, being by Hippocrates addicatifed of these passages, went hometo Caribage ; and there fo dealt with the Senate; that fitte and twentie thouland foot, threethouland horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed vnto his charge; to wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sail by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many, that had anciently belonged voto the Carthaginians, did veeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiese, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcelles with a great part of his Armie, role from Syratufe, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelwis and Herbefas, which yeelded onto him. He tooke also Megara by force and fackt it : either to terrific others that were obftinate, especially the Syrataflans; or elfe because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must have somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall delire was to have faued derigentum : whither hee came too late ; for Himilto had gotten it before. 20 Therefore he returned back toward Syraicale; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too flrong for him. The circumspe-Gion that he vied, in regard of Himileo; flood him in good flead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately iffued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse; intending to joyne his forces with Himileo. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other; and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victoric, against the dispersed and halfe vnarmed Syracissians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himileo, toyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure; and presented battaile to Marcellas, enen at his Trenches, but the Roman wifely refused it. Bomilear alfo a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Hauen of Syraense; and victuailed the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himileo, and fafely arrived at Marcellus his campe: yet many places revolted vnto the Carthaginians; and flue or betraied the Roman Garrisons.

In the midft of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile: and Marcellus leaving some of his Armie before Syracuse, that he might not seeme to have given over the fiege, went vnto Leontium; where he lay intentive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he flood in doubt; whether it were better to 40 continue the laborious worke of belieging Syracufe; or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himileo and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to prevaile: and he himselfe was of an eager disposition, euer vinwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not faisible, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syraeuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his delire. Especially hee affaied to preuaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end, he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his campe; exhorting them to 50 practife with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doc; because the towne would hearken to no parlee. At length a slaue vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syraense; where he talked in private with some few, as he had beene instructed. Thus beganne Murcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators yied to fend him advertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: But when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselues able to effect somewhat of importance : all was discourred; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while; one Damasippus a Lacedamonian, that had beene fent out of the Towne as an Embaffadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very delirous to ranfome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, nor farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans, looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones : and, making an estimate of the height, judged it leffe than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith bee acquainted Marcellus: who cauling better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinaric length would reach it; made all things readic, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded : neither was there hope to prevaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprise. But a sugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citic, as in for-20 mer times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of wine. A better opportunitie could not bee wilhed. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the festivall night, came vnto the walls; which he tooke by Scalado, Syracuse was divided into foure parts (or fine, if Epipole were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diffinet Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten fome peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and fafe lodging, with good flore of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the reft. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia and the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were alreadie in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to hearken vnto. composition; as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans 20 had taken and fackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those, that were sheltred vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether unfurnished of his helpe; fince they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues, and Renegados, were more carefull than ever to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could prenaile. Hippocrates and Himileo, were daily expected; and Bomilear was fent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long cre Hippocrates and Himileo came : who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whilest Epicides sallied out of Acradina vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made fuch defence in each part, that the Affailants were repelled. Neuertheleffe, 40 they continued to befet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as fireightly befieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dillodge. The Romans were (though somewhat leffe) afflicted with the same pestilence, in fo much that Bomilear did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were fent thither. This Bomilear wanted no desire to doe his Countrie service : but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staied; being loath to double the Cape; for that the windes did better ferue the enemie than him. Thither failed Epicides out of Syracufe : to acquaint him with the necessities of the 50 Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length hee came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readic for him, he stood off into the deepe; and failed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell, Then durft not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iffue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian fouldiers, that remained aliue of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as neare as they could fately, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Townethree miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Siell was ginen as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselues, and for the Towner Hercunto Marcellus willingly gaue care : for he had flaied there long enough ; and had cause to seare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ftrong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their liber- 10 tie and proper lawes; yet fuffering the Romans to possesse, whatsoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen readie to be opened vnto Marcellas: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiuing their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themselues, and betraied the Armie to the Romans, Wherefore they presently tooke armes, and fell vpon the new-chosen Pretors: whom they flue; and made election of fixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the souldiers; excepting only the fugitiues. The treatie therefore was againe fet on foot, and wan-20 ted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some seare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman avarice in the sack of Epipola, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts alreadie taken; or by fome defire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that hee might vie the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject vnto Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines, that had beene chosen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as vsually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit about all other respects. With this Captaine, Marceilus dealt fecretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in companie with the Roman Embassadours, daily passing too and fro. This craftic Agent, perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had alreadiegot- 30 ten all Spaine: and that if ever he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where elfe; it was now the only time to doe it; by conforming himfelfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By fuch hopes the Spanish Captaine was eafily wonne : and fent forth his owne brother among the Syracufian Embaffadours, to ratific the couenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards throughly approved at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had beene fuch, as deferued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much leffe, that the mileries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Armie of Mercinaries, should minister vnto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides : it had beene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately flaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also been flaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their delire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascalitic, and some ill aduised Persons, joyned with the Souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they so heard to be cone at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracustans, to make a bargaine under-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries ? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators, thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syrarefirms with gentle wordes, and promifes of good viage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and give over the Dominion of a Citic, fo great, wealthic, flrong, and many waies important. Neuertheleffe if we confider the many inconveniences and great mischiefes, whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by cuill neighbours, and by that very forme of politie, after which it was governed: wee may truly affirme, That it received no small benefit, by becomming subject vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only affured against all forraine enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and fush T yrants as of old had raigned therein ; but freed from the necessitie of banithing, or murdering, the most worthic Citizens, as also from all factions, intelline feditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealoutie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that Citie, from ber first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished. when it refted fecure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molefted, by the difease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But fuch benefit, arifing from wrongsdone, ferues not to make injuffice the more excufable : vnleffe we should approve the answere of that Theefe, who being found to have stollen a filter cup from a lick man, faid, He neuer leaves drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the bootie that it found, was faid to have beene no leffe, than could have beene hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it felfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sen against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was margailoufly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; faue only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes, was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busic about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that he hearkned not to the noise, and vprore in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heavily the death of him; and caused his body to bee honourably 20 buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an infeription of the proportion betweene them; which hee first found out. An Invention of solittle vie, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artifl better, than the deuifing of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is betweene the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar fort. For many an one would thinke the monie loft, that had been spent your a sonne, whose fludies, in the Vniuerlitie had brought forth fuch fruit, as the proportion betweene a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracule, all the Townes in Sicil veelded unto the Romans; except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with 40 one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately lent from Hannibal. This Matines, by many good peeces of scruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian lide; and withall made his ownename great. By his perfivations, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and agains he set upon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and droue them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that having beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal: in that he had fent vinto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and 50 to take upon him, like as good a man as himfelfe. The indignitie feemed the greater, when Autimes, being to step aside vnto Heraelea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; adulfed (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemic, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great Xxxxx 3 part of the Roman Armie was left behinde in Syracufe, as neede required : which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatfoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farregreater were the oddes between the Captaines. For howfoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth, and abilitie, in matter or warre. The Numidians, having before conceived fome displeasure against their Captaines : and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraelea; were much more offended, when they faw that the vaine-glorious enuic of Ilanno carried him vnto the light, vpon a foolish delire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they fent vnto the Roman Generall, and bad him be confident : for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemics that day; but only looke on, and fee the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misvsed. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcel. lus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set vpon the Enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands. droug them back into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could have been conteneed, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himfelfe, and not have bazarded a battaile without neede; the Romans would thortly have been reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre: For M. reellus , was shortly after to leave the Province ; and some 22 vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foot, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Cuthage. The same of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, confiding (for the most part) of the Legions of Canne, tooke it very hainously, that no good feruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as bandled men, they were fent farre from home, and not fuffered to returne back to Reme with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians; and , like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have beene, if the Armiclately overthrowne had beene entire. M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacific his owne men. and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mustres from ouer-running all the Countrie; yet hee hindred the Countrie from revolting vnto Mutines. About threefcore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which, Agrigentum was the principall; and farre bigger than any of the reft. Thence issued Matines as often as he pleafed, in despight of the Romans: not only to the succour of his owneadherents; but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in flead of being pleafed with all these good services, was filled more and more with enuic, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received in firm Gions from old Hanne at Carthage; not to fuffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian to have fhare in the honour of these Sicilian warres; which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest tralie was neglected, that should have been regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritic, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Affiltant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne fonne; thinking thereby to difcountenance the man, and make him little effected, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this fpightfull dealing, occasioned the loffe of whatfocuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numiclians were fo incenfed by the indignitic offered vnto their Countriman, being fuch a braue Com- 50 mander, that they offered him their feruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lauinas, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mulius enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage : He thought it the wifest way, to play the best of his owne game, and for sake that Citie, which was likely to perill by the cuill counfell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himfelfe to fee his Aduerfaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious over-weening; and to fuffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them, to deliuer vp Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicil. The Conful was glad of his friendthip: and carefully followed his aductifements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had vnder-taken. For he with his Numidians did forcibly feize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neare in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had beene no worse matter, than fome fuch tumult of the Numsdians, as hee had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making hafte to pacific the trouble, he faw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himfelle to flight : and fauing him felfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, fet faile for Afrike; leaning all his Armie and Adherents in Sieil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued mafters of the whole Hand.

Leuinus the Conful having taken Azrigentum, did sharpe execution of justice 20 ypon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee fcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans : all the rest of them he sold for flaues, and confileated their goods; fending home to Rome the monie that was raifed of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome flood in no leffe necessitie of gold, than of steele: which may have beene the reason, why Leatinus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuertheleffe the fame of fuch feueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; fo that in great hafte they fought to make their peace. About fourtie Townes yeelded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twentie were deliuered up by Treason; and fixe only staied to be wonne by force. These things done, Lauinus returned home to Rome : carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agatirna; that were a companie of outlawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to line by spoile of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their occupation against the Brutians; a thecuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, hee was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where hee lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipioes in their journie against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is faid) very especial service. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians walted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been emploied in Italie: leaving yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession 40 of this Iland; which they wanted when it beganne.

ð. X V I.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and HANNIBAL in Italia, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metaurus.

Hortly after the winning of Capua; Markellus came to Rome: where, for his good feruices done in the Hand of Stiel, hee had granted with him the honour of the leffer Triumph, which was called Ocation.

The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armic behinde him in the Pro-

with M. Valerius Lauinus, who fucceeded him in the gouernement of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Conful Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them : they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome. in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracufe. The Conful, on the other fide, reckoned up the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him : willing them to bemoane themselues to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the Romans whom they had kept out, 12 Thus each pare having forme good matter to alleage, the Senate made fuch an end of the controperfic as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Commonwealth; blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not refloring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracufians free from their subjection, but comforting them, with gentle wordes, and hopefull promifes, as bath beene showed before. The two new Confuls, Marcellus and Leuinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie; the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil, fell vnto Marcellus: which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syraculians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by feare, from vttering their gricuances freely. Afterwards, when his bu- 20 finefle with them was dispatcht, hee gently undertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countrie in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicil, whose doings there have beene alreadie rehearfed : but Marcellus was emploied against Hannibal.

Before the Confuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preffing of Souldiers to the war e; and most of all, with getting Marriners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer fort, that yied to be emploied in Sea-feruices; especially in rowing. These could not line without present wages : neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to give them pay: Wherefore, it was ordained, that they should be fet out at the expense of private men; who, in this necessitie of the 30 flate, were driven to fullaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured: and were readie to fall into fedition; had not the Gonfuls deferred the matter vnto further confideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of fuch extremitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had alreadic endured so much as well it could under-goe; and fomewhat more, than could with honeftie haue been imposed upon it. Neuerthelesse it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasure was fo emptie, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls beganne to say, That no perswalions would be so effectu-40 all with the people, as good examples and that if the Senators would follow the Confuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the monie that he had; and that no Senator thould keepe any veffell of gold, or plate what focuer; excepting one falt-feller, and a boule where with to make their offerings vnto the Gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as eueric one did vie, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the readie performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and halfily followed by the Gentlemen of 50 Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuseto doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For fince the publike necessitie could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private off ate should runne the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wrack, in vaine could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper fubstance. This magnanimitie descrued well that greatnesses Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conucnient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie against Hannibal; and Leuinus toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon fending the promifed supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loffe of Capua: which gave them cause to looke vnto themselves; as it in his helpe there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in neede. This he no well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedie. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie, that he should not bee able to keepe the field : or else hee must leave them to their owne sidelitie; which now beganne to waver. At length his jealousie grew so outragious, that he facked, and waited, those places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus: and betraied vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater losse, ,, then the Towne it felfe, Blafius the author of this rebellion; could not bring his defire to effect; without getting the confent of one Dafin, that was his bitter enemie. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dasius in private; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuented, and charged of Treason, he so south denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuised out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and feeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This not with standing, Blasius did not cease to prese his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such linely reasons; that bee who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the favour 30 of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Marones and Meles, Townes of the Samnites : wherein hee flew about three thousand of Hannibal

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than hee. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves withill speede in many pettic enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow busineffe of farre leffe importance; had now at length refolued, to fend prefently the great supply, that had beene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better feafon; Rome it selfe might haue beene strucken downe, the next yeare af-40 terthat great blow received at Canne. But fince that which is past cannot be amended: Hannibal must force himselfeto make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with flue thousand Numidians, readie to set faile for Spaine : whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Astrubal should forthwith take his journie into Italie; of which there had beene fo long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to prevent the threatning mischiese, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, 50 that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay neare vnto Herdonea to get the Towne by practife. It was not long, fince, neare vnto the fame place, another Cn. Fuluius had loft bis armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fuluius heard newes of his approch. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more hafte than good speede. The Roman Legions made good refistance awhile, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowt; and great flaughter was made of them. Fuluius himselfe, with twelve Tribunes or Coronells, were lost: of the common fouldiers that were flaine, the number is vncertaine; fome reporting fouen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdones, because it was at point to have yeelded vnto Fuluius, Hannibal did fet on fire: and putting those to death that had practifed with the Enemie, carried away the multitude; whom hee beflowed among the Thurians and Metapentines. The Conful Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly abase the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginan apace : and ouer-taking him at 12 Numifire in the countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darkneffe, with vicertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulis, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmilhes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and fought to bring the enemie within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light and vpon faire

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fuluius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Confuls. Fabius, confidering how much the Roman 20 affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purpoled that yeare to beliege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that fcarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Collegene and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served vinder him the yeare before) to preffe the Carthaginian fo hard, as he might have no leifure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for hee thought no Roman fitter than himselse, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannufium, and thence from place to place : defiring ever to come to battaile, but vpon equal termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight : but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmill; as 30 being desirous to keepe his Armie strong untill the comming of Afdrabal. Yet could he not avoide the importunitie of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitie of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustic, and to beat foundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would never fuffer them to be at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile: wherein Hannibas had the victorie; tooke fixe Enfignes; and flue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards; telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stra- 42 tageme. With these, and many other the like wordes, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vexe them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemie, than fuch displeasure of their Generall; they befought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once agains to fight. He did so : and placing those Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victoric; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemie quiet : and therefore was readie to fight againe, fince all other motiues continued the same, and his men had beene heartned by the late victorie. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor 50 loft, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemie, notwithstanding their late victorie, as readie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie : which hee purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Curthaginians were flaine, and three thousand of the Roman fide, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow : especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was fo great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dillodged by night. Neuertheleffe it sufficed, that Fabius the Conful hereby got leifure, to follow his bufineffe at Tarentum without any diffurbance. Q. Fuluins the other Conful, about the fame time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lutans, and vol(centes, that willingly yeelded themselves, and betraied the Garrisons of Hannibil that lay in their Townes : whom Fuluing entertained in louing fort; gently rebuking them for their errours past, without punishing those that had been authors, or butie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeues, which Laumus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then also feron worke to beliege Gaulonia, a towne of the Brillians : and nothing was omitted; that might ferue to divert Hannibal, from the fuccour of Tarentum. O. Fabius the Conful, having taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, fate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that feemed needfull to carrie it, either by affault or long fiege. Of the Garrifons in the Towne a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in lone with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof thee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman fide; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Conful acquainted with thele newes : and faid, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Miltris, to doe what shee would have him. The Conful hearing this: and finding likelibood in the matter, willed his fouldier to convey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his defire. The Souldier grew acquiainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswalions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his fifter; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Conful with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutism kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make refistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himfelfe, with the choice of his men, came in great filence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to per vp. and breake open the next gate; whereat the Armie was let in. The to Tarentines, and Carthaginian fouldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market-place : but (as happeth in like cases, where the maine confidence is alreadic taken away) not very obstinately. 27 ico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner : hoping to be well vied, because of hospitalitie that had passed betweene his Father and the Conful. But he was flaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the fword : in fuch fort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This flaughter of the Brutians, was thought to have beene made by appointment of the Conful, to the end that he might feeme to have wonne the Towne by to force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glorie which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great : whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiofities that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell voon those that belieged Caulonia. They fled at his comming : but he was so neare, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill; which served to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselues a litle while, and then they yeelded. When this bulinesse was done, he hasted away to relieue Tarentum. But when hee came within five miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was loft. This grieued him : yet he faid no more than this? The Romans have also their HANNIBAL; wee have loft 10 Turentum in fuch fort as we got it. That he might not feeme to turne back amased, or in any feare of the victorious Conful; he incamped a few daies together, so neare as he was voto Tarentum : and thence departing to Metapontum , bethought himfelfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He capied the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgine them all offences past. These letters were fent by two yong men of the same Citie : who did their errand so well: that the Conful wrote back by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad and at good leifure, made readic his ambulhes for the warie Fabins. But whether fome secret no- 20 tice of the plot were given; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journie to Metapontum was deferred. Hercupon the fame two Meffengers were emploied againe: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discouered all.

This yeare was happie to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where; fauc only at Caulonia; where they loft a companie of fuch lewed fellowes, that it may seeme good fortune, to have so beene rid of them. But their common pouertie, and disabilitie to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. I hirtie Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which , twelue refufed to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was confidered; that the Le- 10 gions of Canna, and those vnhappie Companies, that had beene beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fuluius; were transported into Sicil; where they lived, in a fort, as banilhed men. This grieued their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeares together they had beene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of monie; ineuery of which yeares, they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the leaft that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the Enemie to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him : whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe with- 40 in awhile, that they should be all confumed : since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Golonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelve, That they should boldly denic vnto the Romans, their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Confuls heard the Embassadors of these townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amased. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a to better answere for a smuch as this, was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that their people were not Campans, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no leffe partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not ferue: the Embaffadours continuing to proteft, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remayning, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate thele twelve, but the wed themselves willing to widergoe what foeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offerwas so highly pleasing to the Consulis; that the Embassisors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assemble propele: where, with commemoration of all their former good services, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thankes accordingly bestlowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassiadors of to those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought bestly, neither to retain them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor to take any notice of them at all shuleaue them to their owne consideration of their ill description of them

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve People would have wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Afdrubal had beene then comming into Italie. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuerthelesse, they were faine to open their most privile treasurie; and thence take out the golde, that had been elayed up to ferue them in cases of greatest extremitie. of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Conful, to fet him well out against the Tarentines, all the rest, was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Afdrudal might not paffe from thence into Italie. It is likelie that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Aldrubal; neither the money fent into Spaine, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could fuffice. Neuerthelesse it fell out happily for the People of Rome, that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could have beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amiffe to note, That fince the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driven to furnish 20 the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left : it must needes be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre leffe then fame had reported it; or elfe that Scipio had not as yet wonne it : how for uer Linie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arrivall.

M.Claudius Marcellus; and T.Quintius Crifpinus, were chosen Confuls after Fabius and Fuluitus. In their yeare it was, that Afdrubal tooke his journey out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeare following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had loft much time about Cuma and Naples, in feeking to make himselfe Master of a good haven, for the landing of those succours that were promifed from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his printo cipall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ereadie to come. But fince this hope was vanished, and the long promifed fuccour of Afdrubal was (though farre later than had beene expedient) readie to arrive; he began to defile with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from hearkening to any follicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouertie of the Romans, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did embolden many of the Herrurians, especially the Aretines, to take fuch counfell as they thought most expedient for themselves; without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of their conspiracie, fant Marcellus the new chosen Conful into Hetraria: whose comming did so terrifie them, that they refted quiet for a while. All the yeare following they were deuting how to breake out : as contrariwife the Roman Propretors; partly by terror of seuere judgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they vifited all fulpected places, kept them honeft against their wills; and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest defire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crisinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fuluius and Fabius nad gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the fiege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie : and brought thither all forts of engines ; fen- 10 ding for a fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not flow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whose approch, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise, and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Confuls daily offered battaile. This great man of Warre had no neede to fland vpon his reputation : which was alreadic fo confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto seare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdome, He entertained the Confuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take themat fome aduantage; referuing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater emploiment. In this lingring manner of Warre, Marcellus tooke no pleafure: but fought to compell the Enemie to battaile, whether he would or no. The 20 Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to affaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he beganne, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the affiliance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eic behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betweene Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their companie, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprife, and faue their owne lines within Tarentum. As for the Confuls, it was the defire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little : which to doe, hee negleeted no aduantage. There lay betweene him and them an Hillock, ouer-growne 20 with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiscerned, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he fent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keepe themselues close, and attend their best aduantage. To this peece of ground, the Confuls thought it fit to remoue their campe : Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neare enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode, to view the place, accompanied with the fonne of Marcellus, a few Colonells, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approch to his fellowes; who discouered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls 40 and their traine. The Confuls, as necessitic compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to bee quickly relieved from their campe that was neare at hand. But the Hetrurians ranne away from them, at the first : and left them in that great danger, to the weake affiftance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregelle. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to have brought them fafe off. But when Marcellus was ftricken through with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then beganne euery one to shift for himfelfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe: The rest of the Colonells and Officers, together 50 with the Lictors that carried the bundells of Rods and Axes before the Confuls, were all flaine or taken. To the dead bodie of the Conful Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall; according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his albes in a filter pot, coucred it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Ottercellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus, was fellen into the custodic of Hannibal; who might vie it, to his owne purpofes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore hee tent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was flaine, and that Hamibal had gotten his Ring: wilhing them in that regard, to give no credit vnto any letters therewithall figned. This prouidence of Crifpinus, was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another 10 Mellenger arrived there fent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and lealed with the captive Ring : whereof the contents were, That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison thould be in a readinesse, for such emploiment as hee should thinke needfull. The device was plaine; and no leffe plaine was the revengefull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein beene betraied. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemie in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger which was a Roman fugitive; without letting him perceive any figne of diffrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainement of such 20 afriend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues, armed Roman like, leading the way. These all talking Latin together, called ynto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conful was there. The gate was opened, faire and leifurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when fixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themfelues; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with

Hannibal being thus ouer reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admiral! of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did lay hard flege. 20 The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vanteurrors, made the Romans, in all confused halte, runne to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate, hearing of thele accidents, fent vnto Collinus the furniting Conful, and requested him to name a Dictator: that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. Hee did so : and soone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Confuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies, lay so neare vnto the Enemic, without any Generall. Especially it was defired, that election should be made of such men, as were 40 not only valiant, but well adusted : tince the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by loofing himfelfe fo strangely, had given them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that flood for the Confulfhip, C. Claudius Nero was the most eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staied wit. The Fathers therefore endequoured to joyne vnto him in the Confulthip M. Liuius : one that had borne the fame Office, long before. This M. Linius had beene Conful with L. Emylius Paulus, in the yeare foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Confulthip, wherein they did 50 good feruice, they had both of them been called into judgement by the People : and this Linius condemned: Emylius hardly escaping. Though it hath been once alreadie noted, yet I cannot for beare to remember it againe; how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankefull Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Canne, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their injustice wrought: when L. Emylius rather choseto yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatell ouerthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by relifting the pernicious courles of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furic. As for M. Liuius, he is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the Peopleof their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeares together after his condemnation had hee beene absent out of the Citic, and lived in his Countrie Grange; vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lauinus, being Confuls two or three yeares agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued private, in discontented fort, as might appeare, both by his carelesnesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that age were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenfors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vied to fit filent, and fignifie his affent or diflike to what was proposed; either in short formall wordes, or in passing from fide to fide, when the house was divided. At length it hapned, that in some bulinesse weightily conce ning one that was his kinfman, he flood vp, and made a fet speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them inquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered fince he had lett it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather ferued to fill vp the number, than to answere to the dignitic of the place: 20 and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all beganne to fav, that it was great pittle, fo worthie and able a man, as this Liuius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great neede, yet had not vied, in this dangerous warre. Now feeing that the Confuls ought, oncof them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lauinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Clandius Nero: enery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Liuius. But Livie would not endure to heare of this. He faid it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dilhonest man, should afterwards be chosen 10 Ruler of the Citic. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases hee relisted their defires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the People, and repaired good for cuill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themissionless checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: relembling himselfe to a Plane tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but runne vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulnesse, to well-descruing men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much 40 vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deferts; yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but emploied the same Duke, whom he had newly difgraced. Thus is wisdome often taught by necessicie.

It was a dangerous yeare toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were chofen Confuls. Afdrubal was alreadie come into France, and waited only, to haue the wates of the alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italie. The Romans vsed at this time the service of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employ- 50 ment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure served in Spaine, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the reit were fo disposed, in severall parts of Italie, where neede seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Confuls. But the Confuls were men of execution : and would not be tied to the punctuall observance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Liuius would not firre out of Rome, against so mightic a power as . followed Afdrubal; vntill hee had first obtained, that hee might carrie with him as many as could well be spared from other emploiments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies: It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serve under Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeare, among the Cifalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Living; to whom the warre against Aldrubal was alotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neare unto Tarentum, under another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Arno mie; that was fent against Hannibal. Neuerthelesse the Confuls, by the especiall instance of Liuie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne differetion. For newes came, that Afdrubal was alreadic passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to joyne with him; and L. Porcius fent word, that he would adventure no further, than hee fafely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each, his feuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had beene, when L. &mylius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were fent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direst their Generalls; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victoric betimes ; but rather they flood in fcare; least all diligence, wisdome, and valour, should proue too little. For fince few yeares had paffed, wherein some one of their Generalls had not beene flaine; and fince it was manifelt, that if either of these present Confuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed agreater happinesse than could be expecked, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour. from fuch mightic opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held up her head, euer fince the battaile of Canna: though it were fo, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilear; and one, that in his present Expe-20 dition, had feemed, a man of more fufficiencie than Hannibal himfelfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riners, and Mountaines, that were thought unpaffeable, Hannibal had loft a great part of his Armie: this Afdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow ball, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first fetting out of spaine. These considerations and the like, of which scare presented many vnto them; caused the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a pensitue traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus and Criffins, vpon whom in the like fort they had given attendance the last yeare; but saw neither of them re-40 turne aliue, from a leffe dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accuflomed aduife to M. Linius, that he should abstaine from giving, or taking battaile, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Conful made him a froward answere, and faid, That he would fight the very first day : for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victorie; or by seeing the overthrow of his owne vnjust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his wordes.

Of the overthrow that Aldrubal received in Spaine, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his journie into Italie; fuch mention hath alreadic beene made, as agreed with thereport of that noble Historian Linie. Yet I thinke it not amiffe to adde in this to place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historic, Except, E.

concerning that accident. Afdrubal had wreftled with many difficulties in Spaine: Polybluff. 1,10. by reason of those Capraines that were sent from the citie of Carthage, to joyne with him in the administration of that Province : they being as it may seeme of the Hannonian faction; which is to fay, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-nantage of their owne fide, before the good of their Commonwealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthie fonne of Amilen, and how they hindered his courses vndertaken, it can not be knowne : fince of those bookes, wherein Polybius bath exactly handled their matters; there are to vs remaining, only a few broken preces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselie, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceine. that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partilans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuerthe. leffe Aldrubal was a good Patriot : and therefore endured patiently fuch indignities. as Musines could not long digett. His journie into Italie being resolued vpon: he lay to with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of filuer; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe. though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his affiltance. The ouerthrow feemes not to have beene fo great. as it must have beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Afarubal dealt like a provident man: and feeing that his Campe was likely to bee forced, fent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him : but ftaied behinde himfelfe to futtaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might bee out of danger. Herein he had his defire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in fuch fort, that Scipio thought it not good to purfue him, and 20 fo paffed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces affigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Afdrubal the some of Gefco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio have stopped him on his journie, by fending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether Afdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scepio had fet to keepe the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly forts to no good effeet) he was not letted in his voiage by any fuch impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: hee found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defen- 20 ded against him, nor any fort of relisfance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice; for that hee was driven to Winter in their Countrie; whileft that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewife, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journie ouer the Alpes; were easily wonne to take part with Asdrubal, when he travailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to robbe them of their cattaile; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed 40 Therefore understanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disloyned alunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cifalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also joyned with Afdrubal: and so would the Heirurians have done; if he had arrived in their Countrie. There was no other Reman Armie neare, than L. Parcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Afdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible; by the destruction of that Towne. But there hee lost a great deale of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by vnderta- 50 king which, he gauethe Roman Confuls leifure, to make readie for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Afdrubal his so timely, and cassly passing the Alpes, was about to leave his wintring camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to fit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Conful, made what focede hee could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from joyning with his brother. He had about fortic thoufand foot, and five hundred horfe; with which he daily offered battaile to the Cuthagmian; and had of him the better in many skirmillies. Phinnibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; Which were ochierwise too weake for the fournie intended. Afterward comming to Gramburan, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vaprosperoully with Neverthe Conful. Nevertheleffe he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him and had there 10 againe the better of him. Wherefore hee was driven to returne to Well apontum: where joyning with Hanne, that had made readie a good Armie ; her affaired againg to make way by force to his brother. So he paffed on ward, and came againe to Venulia, having Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he over the River hilled mis to Canulium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place in which he had obtained, his most memorable victorie. There also did Nero sit downe by him; and both of them refled, without making offer to fight. It feemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canufium : where if he could once againe deale with both the Confuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victorie, as once he had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so fallen out; Rome would have beene vidone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have heeded to with any fecond victorie, in the naked Champans about Canna; if flich an armile, as this which Adrubal now brings, had come to fecond Hunnibal, when hee was in his full firength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthie Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanne was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which elfe no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilest Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it ellower to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their luctour. He was ad-20 pertiled of Aldrubal his approch; by Letters and Mellengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. Thele gave notice, that Afdrabal had left the fiele of Plas centia, and drew onwards apace: being alreadic come within two hundred tillles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could bee made by with the Coll ful. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing joyfull. For if Handlow could once be joyned as head, vnto that great bodie of an Armie, which Afdrubal brought with him; it was most apparant, that how soeuer the fortune of Rome Hibbild anold, for the prefent, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of fo friding a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Affociates; to faith vnder the burden; as twelve of the thirtie Roman Colonics had alreadic done. Wherefore he 40 refolued, that it were better to make any desperate admenture, than to suffer the conjunction of two fuch malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the fulldaine, yet within few yeares, was like to worke most lamentable effect. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to flay the progresse of Afdrubat : neither were there any good Legions in a readine fe, that could doe fervice in fuch a needfull case; excepting those, that were alreadie emploied under the two Consuls. Herevpon hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal : but rather that it Behoued him , to helpe where more necessitic required; and to carrie part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet fince the meeting of the two to Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it feemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armie: and making flew, as if he would only flep aside, to doe fome small peece of service neare at hand; away hee posted as fast as hee could, to affift his fellow Conful. His Meffengers ranne before him, to give warning to all Townes by which he was to paffe, that they should be readie to meet him, with vi-Availls, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Liusus the other Consul, at that time. lay incamped, neare vnto Sena Gallica; and Afdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In fixe daies Nero had finished his journie thither; and when he drew neare, sent Mes. fengers before him, to give notice of his comming. Livie thought it fittest that hee thould flav in some place of couert untill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe : least the Enemic, perceiving this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done : and a token given, that the Colonells, Cap. taines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; 10 should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was formwhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Neuertheleffe, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which received them, should bee enlarged; fince they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counfaile of warre : wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few daies after their wearie iournie, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and befought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiuing that the honour 20 of the victorie was like to be theirs: for a fmuch as the battaile would not have beene undertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counfaile brake vp, that the figne of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generalls paulion.

Afdrubal was no leffe willing than the Romans to come to battaile: having long defired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it feemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses, looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iournie. Hereupon he beganne to with draw his Armie back into the Campe : and 30 gaue order, that if no prisoners could bee taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whither the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might thew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath beene said, was not extended; but the trumpet, that founded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrarie to former custome, found twice in the quarter of Linius the Conful. Hereat Afdrubal greatly mused : and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a fure token, that the other Conful, was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon 40 confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neare hee lay to the Romans; nor troubled himfelfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation: he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night: intending to get ouer the River Metaurus; whereby to keepe him felfe as long as he could, from necessitie of battaile. But whether it were fo, that his guides did steale away from him in the darke, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauic, and hindred his speede: farre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone af- 50 ter came L. Porcius with the light armature : whom the other Conful followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and readic for battaile. As drubal, seeing himfelfe ouer-taken with necessitie to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he repoted least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, without much difficultie, bee able to climbe; in the right wing he stood himselfe, with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians hee placed in the midit; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman fide, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Livius of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of fafetic there was unto the yanguished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men delirous to have fled from them. And, according to this prefumption, came Linius the Conful with a proud brauerie, to give charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the vi-Aprie seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout souldiers; and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Liquisms also were a hardie Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the leffe, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midft. Linius therefore, and Porcius, found from opposition; and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Belides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first rankes; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vame against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules; that stood op-20 polite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Aftrubal the more confident; who leeing his owne left wing fafe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other fide, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Mero, perceiuing that the place wherein he flood, was fuch as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Linius; which having compaffed, he fell vpon Aldrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victoric to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to relift him in front, ranne all along the depth of Adrabal his battaile: and falling upon the skirts thereof, difordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every fide, the greatest part 30 was flaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and faued themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aliue: the rest were slaine; fome by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that ode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, beganne to wexe vnruly, and ruft back vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betweene the cares, in the joynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith hee killed the beaft vpon the fuddaine. This focedie way of preuenting such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the foundrons following them; is faid to have beene the device of afdrubal himselfe: who died in this battaile. Great commendations are ginen to Afdrabal, both by Polybius, and by Liuie. Heis faid at all times to have shewed himselfe worthie of Amilear his father, and Hannibal his brother; to have striven with great patience, against many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the meanes of those Gaptaines, that were fent from Carthage into Spaine; to have performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthie Generall; and finally when hee faw the loffe irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting brauely, hee was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Linie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Canne; that fiftie fixe thousand of them were flaine, five thousand and soure hundred taken prisoners; and aboue sour thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captines with them, delinered, and set at libertie. He faith alfo, that of the Romans and their Affociates there were flaine eight thousand and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes; but in gold and filuer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it.

CHAP.3. S.16.

Likely it is to have beene as rich as Linic reportethit; for Afarbal came well flored with monie. But Polybing (who had no defire to make this battaile of Metamum, a parallel vinto that of Camne) reports no more than about ten thouland of the Cantosignium idee, and two thouland of the Roman, to have beene flaine. The rumber of the prifoners he doeth not mention is but only faith. That flome of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alite 3 and that all the reft died in the battaile. Whereby it may feeme, that they were all Burchines: For a funch as they preferred the honour of them filters, and of their Countrie, about their lines.

The joy of this victorie, was no leffe in Rome, than had beene the feare of the euent. For cuer fince it was knowne in what fort Were had left his Armie; the whole to Citie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staied behinde, much weakned, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet referuing their cenfure vnto the successe; with libertie to approue or condemne, according to the iffue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counfaile, waiting still readie at hand upon the Magiftrates: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require every 10 ones helpe. In briefe, they were all fo full of melancholie, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Meffengers arrived from the Confuls, with Letters contayning all that had paffed: there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their prinate bulinesse; making contracts one with another ( which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wife, as if Hannibal were alreadie driven out of Italie.

Were returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Afdrubal before the Carthaginians : and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them 30 loofe to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners, might have ferued well enough to certific Hannibal of this miladuenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Afarubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had given buriall to Gracehus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carkaffes fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howfocuer the People of Carthage, wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more civill, and leffe prone to the infolence of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the fuddenterrour of fuch a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that 40 which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being over-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest libbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having loft in this vnhappie fight (befides that worthie Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that fo long fustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrie of the Brutians : and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewife all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted mento defend fo many places as he held at the prefent, because they lay too farre afunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a leffer compaffe in the vtmoft corner of Italie; it being a Countrie of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly denoted to his feruice. In this bufineffe Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Sommer, when their haruest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Liuius the other Conful tarried among the Cifalvine Gaules vntill the end of Sommer; there to fet things in fuch order as he thought requilite: which done, hee wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more neede of him and his Armie in that Prouince; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, hee delired leave to returne home; and that he might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was to have the honour of a triumph, as he well deferued. But for a fmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late vi-Aorie : order was given, that not only Livie with his Armie should come home : but likewise Nero; though leaving his Armic behinde him, to confront Hannibal So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Liuie made the greater flew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armicalfo being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse back, and without fuch attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victoric was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Netther wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cacilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good feruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthie to bee chosen Consuls and Consuls they were chosen for the yeare following. But nothing was done by them, worthie of memorie, in their Consuiship. Neither indeede from this yeare, which was the thirteenth of the prefent warre, untill the eighteenth yeare wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; faue only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by furprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer : and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him ; but thought it well that hee was quiet. Such opinion had they conceined of him; that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold him-20 felfe vpright. And furely very notable are the commendations given vnto him by Polybius; whom Linie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, hee obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of fo many fundrie Nations, Africans, Spamards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; hee held them all in fuch good order, that they never fell to fedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Liuie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he fullained his Armie, without helpe from other places, from this time forward, youn the hungric foile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in fuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Aldrubal, he made no inuation you the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himfelfe fill among the poore Brutians. Where we must leave him untill he be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

How P. CORNELIUS SciPIO the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

How the Carthaginians were driven by SCIPIO from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

A G O, and A S D R V B A L the fonne of Gefco, tooke vpon them the charge of Spaine, when Adrubal the fonne of Amilear departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voiage to the Baleares; there to leuie a supply of men : and Afdrubal with-draw himfelfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romanshad ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned inco Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the fame perhaps that had lately beene emploied in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to fucceede in place of Afdrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlikely 10 that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that fonne of Amilear, whose authoritie had beene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it felfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon delire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home; or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purpoling afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Countrie of the Celtiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other perswasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himfelfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentive, as it may feeme, to the proceedings of Afdrubal the fonne of Amilear; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italie, to the affiltance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius the Confuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians : hee fent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and flue hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by fome fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great diforder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neare to these Celtiberians : and falling upon them on the suddaine, gave them such an over- 40 throw, that Hanno and Mago comming to their fuccour, in flead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the loffe. Mago faued himfelfe, with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand; and intendaies journey brought them fafe to Afdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either flaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to bee taken prifoner: though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make thift; and faued most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise bee, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie stood, by the comming thither of Afdrabal. Tenthousand footand eighteene hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by 50 fome Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie : or was perhaps about to fend them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentine to the necessitie and succeffe of his Countrimen at home. But when had word of the great victorie at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Sommer, then might hee well adnenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needes be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of fuch an ouerthrow. The Spanil Souldiers that ferued under Hannibal, and those that had beene sent ouer into Africk; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, That all which had followed Aldrubal into Italie, were fallen into the handes of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie, was closed up in a streight, whence hee could not get out: then did it greatly behout the Spaniards to conforme themselues vnto the will of the Vifors. That it was the fuccesse of things in Italie, which gave such considence vnto o Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, untill the Sommer, was almost spent. Afarubal therefore yied the benefit of the seafon; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the Enemie, from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeare, caused Scipio to returne backe : without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by affault the Towne of Oringis.

Against the next yeares danger, Astrubal prepared a great Armie : and spared nor coft, nor trauaile, in strengthning himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With feuentie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie ... Elephants, he tooke the field : which number I beleeue that hee could hardly haue raifed, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italio. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee judged it needfull to vie the helpe of his Spaniff friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were calt away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries; made him on the other fide very doubtfull, of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Colchas, that was Lord of eight and twentie Townes, had promifed him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and fine hundred horse for his service : hee resolved to make vse of those, and some few others; that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee to able to doe great harme, if they would reuolt. So with fine and fortie thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemie; neare to whom hee incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masanissa fell vpon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whileft hee was making his lodgings. But hee laied certaine troupes of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retrait: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betookerhemselues to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added fome courage to the Romans, and abated the prefumption of the Carthiginians: there were daily skirmishes betweene the horse, and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Afdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged 40 it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to flow that he durft fight 5 yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: Afdrubal being fill the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the cuening, withdrew himselse into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries, were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before defigned. But Scipio, when hee purposed indeede to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and to withall, came forth earlier than he had beene wont. He caused his men, and horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day : and then fent forth his horse and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptic: vling herein the same trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Afdrabal fent forth his horfe in all hafte, to entertaine the Romans. whill he himfelfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which he incamped. In the skirmilhes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better : fince being over-preffed on either fide, they had a fafe retrait vnto their foot; and one troupe feconding another by courfe, returned to charge, This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well ted themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemie. But about noone, he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards faire behinde them; that came on leifurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercinaries that flood in Afdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, fant only in number, to the Latin and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in halle; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the fame time, by the Roman Velites, and by fome cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the fame purpose: they were forely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginiens would faine have fuccoured them; but that they durft not flire out of their places, because of the Spanish battaile which was coming against them though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Adrubat his Armie stood idle; vn. till the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards; he must have cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him between the Ro. 20 man wings; to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himfelfe inclosed in such fort, as was the Conful Paulus at the battaile of Canna. Whereforchee did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies; than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer bee ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chanceled them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In procedle of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured luftie, when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly : and gaue not ouer, till they had forft the enemie to change his 22 pace and runne from him. Aldrubal did his best to have made an orderly retrait: and afterward againe, to have caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not fuffer the victorie to bee so extorted from them: neither was it calle to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obitinate passion of scare which hearkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day beene taken; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the fuddaine, and bred fome superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The fame night, Afdrubal gave no rest to his men: but caused them, hungric, and ouer-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein 40 hee feared to bee affaulted. But little affurance could hee haue in the firength of his Trenches; when he had loft the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his fubicits: many followed this example; and foone after, two ftrong Townes were veelded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the perperse for tune of this late battaile, whereupon Afdrubal had fet his reft; bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to believe the more casily those reports which they heard from Italia. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Aldrubal, perceiuing this, with-drew himfelfe, and marched away, faster than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning; and overtaking the Cartha- to ginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand; that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell flaughter: for there was no refishance made, but all fell to rout, faue only scuen thousand, that with Aldrubal himselferecourred a very strong peece of ground, which they fortified in haste.

This place he made shift awhile to defend but wanting there necessaries to sustaine himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he refolued to make thift for one; and itealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-fide, that was not farre thence; hee tooke Inipping, and let faile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Afdrubal was thus sone; he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot and a thousand horse to beliege their Campe (which was not taken in hafte, for Mago and Mafaniffa stated in it) whilest he with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Mafanissa followed Asarubal to Gades: and their Armie dispersed it felte; fome flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were only three Townes left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Aftapa, that made countenance of warre against the Romans : of which only Cafulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had saued themselves by flight, in the late ouerthrowes. Hereby it feemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who faid, that Caftulo yeelded long fince vnto the Romans ; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out, on the Carthaginian fide. Illiturgi had fometimes beene inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their denotion. Yet after the death of the two elder scipioes, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not only rebelled; but with great crueltie betraied, and flue, the poore menthat escaped thither from the overthrowes. Aftapa was a Towne, that had ftill adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worfe, had thriuen by spoile of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeare) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Hiturgiand Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a general slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius: or rather destroied by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, and filter, with what socuer elfe was precious; the women and children standing by it under a sure guard; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouition being 20 made : all the Inhabitants that could be are armes, rushed forth desperately : and fell vpon the Roman campe; where friging beyond their power, they were every one flaine. Then was the Towne forth-with fet on fire, by those that had taken charge to docit : and many of the Romans confirmed with the flame; whilest they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile readie

Afdrubal, being beaten into the Hand of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with feuen Gallies; leaving Augo behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, if any should be offered. Hee visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Mafafili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to winne him to the friend-40 thip of the Carthagmians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried syphax quite another way. For Scipio, having driven the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethinke himselfe, how to finish the warre; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hercunto it feemed that the helpe of Syphax would be much availeable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and fustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eafily be moued to feeke revenge. He had also beene beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that fent him ouer a Captaine into Afrike: who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadouts to 50 Rome, and made league with the Citie, in a time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceined hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Afrike; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lelius his Embassadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to Zzzzz 2

doe in Spaine; eafily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better. and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested, that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthic of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies hee tooke Sea : and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asarubal. This would have beene very dangerous to him, had he beene discried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen, they forbare to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; feeing at one time, two fuch Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. Hee would have brought them to treat of peace : but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of fuch commission from the Senate. He feasted them together : and shortly difmiffed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into couenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Funerall games held by SCIPIO. A duell betweene two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

SCIPIO returning into Spaine, and refting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeare, vpon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath beene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end : hee performed at new Carthage, with great folemnitie, some Vowes that he had made; and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at fharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vied in the Citie of Rome for there were enough, that either offe- 10 red themselues as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to give proofein fingle combat, of the valour that was in their feuerall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corbis, and Orfus, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principalitie of a Towne called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers fonne: wherfore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irill Tanillrie. But the father of Orlua flood lately feized of the Principalitie: which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brother; vet this his fonne would not let it goe back; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his 40 father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had alreadic laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, eafily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats have beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Thefeus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy; the one, betweene Paris and Menelaus; the other, betweene Hector and Aiax. Neither want 50 there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene David and Goliah; and Givers performed by fome of Davids Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelue of the Tribe of Inda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horaty, against the three brethren Curialy that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and thortly after, of Valerius Corninus with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of leffe importance, as having only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great combat fought, betweene Edmond Ironfide and Canutus the Dane, for no leffethan the Kingdome. The vie of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon every occasion, great or small. In the raigne of Edward the third, who Justained the partie of Mountfort against the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Duchie of Britaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations; between thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Hiltories. Most of them have beene combats of braueric, and of gayete decure, as the French terme it; for honor of feuerall Nations; for love of Mistreffes: or what focuer elfe gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out them selues. But befides those of this fort, there are two other natures of combats, which are, either vpon acculation for life; or vpon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. and And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee spake even now, betweene Corbis and or [ua.: Nnto these (methinkes) may be added, as of different condition from the reft, the combat vpon Wager; fuch as were that betweene Dauid and Golish; or that betweene the Horaty and Curiaty : in which, without regard of Title, the Domimion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured you the head of Champions. Ypon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Hen. A. 21, Ric. 241. rie of Boulinbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir Iohn Aufley and one Cattrington: whom Anfley charged A. 3. Ric. 241, with treason; and proved it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort and Henrie of Effex. The like also, betweene a Nauar- A. o. Henradi. 20 rois and one Welch of Grimsby, whom the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our trial by battaile doe determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquilhed, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proued; I cannot affirme. But we enery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) bee ouer-come. He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not fo : neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but hee may trie it by his Champion; as did Paramor and Lowe, or offered to doe, in the 40 raigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this cafe, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loofeth only his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, upon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of braueric; but in campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was fo ordinarie in France, before the time of St. Lewes, and Philip the faire his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclefiafficall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurifdiction. And it feemeth that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Me- . Silvening de morialls of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Article to this effect : That if a combat I oralico Vadia were once accepted, and after, by confent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings fixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the 10 partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vie when any man hath had an hard or vnjust judgement; faying, That hee was tried by the Law of Lorar, or Berne; on le battu pave l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Tuo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complaine, and · clears vefit specially against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch bilhop of Sens, and toothers; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie, and kinde of reiall, was retrencht by Saint Lemes, and Philip the faire; fo that no man thould decree, or grant it, faue the King himselfe. It hath lince beene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carenges against taques le Gris; and to Iulian Remere the Spaniard. 2 gainst More, his Countriman : wherein Sir Henrie Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie, and laftly to the Lord of Chair Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other of to fence descriing death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le desendeur estoit tenu de propojer ces dessenses per une dementir; The Desendant was bound to pleade not guil tie, by giving the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taifiblement confesser le crime ; filently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euery pettie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giving of the Lie mortalitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put up, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had patiently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded/upon noneof those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honor of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe fo many Duells, as are founded vpon meere private Anger, yea or vpon matter faming worthie of anger in the opinion of the Duellifts. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint perfonall combats; the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrells. This is held a word fo terrible, and a wrong fo vnpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, 20 than the bloud of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen after the patterne of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we have derined a kinde of Arte and Philosophic of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yeathere are (among many other no leffe ridiculous) some so mysticall curiolities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemie a flight touch with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword: the one, having relation to a slaue; the other, to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretie: though, for mine owne part, if I had had any fuch Italionated enemie in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions, who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I fay, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; vie nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworne to pay the monies and other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Liers by Record, by being fued in some Court or other of Justice, vpon breach of se word, or bond? For he which hath promised, that he will pay monie by a day; or promifed any thing elfe, wherein he faileth; bath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath beene made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make nowa-daies? What is the vowing of their service, and of all they have, vsed in their or-dinarie complements, and (in effect) to enery man whom they bid but good-morrow, or falute, other than a courteous and courtlike kinde of lying? It is (faith a wife French-man, deriding therein the Apill custome of his Countrie) wie marché complot fait ansemblation fe macquer, mentir, coloiper les ons les autres ; A kinde of merchanding, and completinade among them, to mock belie, and deride each other : and to farre now-a daies in fallaipp, and in wee as he that yeeth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynically True it is not with flunding (ominting the old diffunctions) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complemental lies, with those which are famtime per fweded by necessitie woon breach of promise; and those which men 10 vie out of cowardize and feare othe latter confesting themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God ; a vice of all other filed the most villainous. But now for the Light folfo, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrella in effect : to it I fay, That who forgings another manthe Lie, when it is manifest behat he bath lied, dorh him no wrong at all; neitherloughtit to be more hainoully taken, than to tell him, that he bath broken any promise which he had notherwise made. For he that promileth any thing, tolls him, to whom he hath promifed, what hee will performe it ; and, in not performing it, be hatti made him lelfe a Lier. On the other lide. He that gives any manthe Lie, when him felfe knowes that he, to whom it is given, hath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to him felfe. And what cause have I, if I an fay that the Suppreshines when it doth thine, and that another fellow tells me I lic, for it's mid-night; to profecute fuch an one to death; for making himfelfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Liet in his owneknowledge ! For he that gives the Limin any other difpute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; give sittimpertinently and Ruffianlike. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudeneffecto taxe day man in publike with anymeruth; (if it be not pernicious, and to his projudice against whom the varruth isyttered) but all that is rude; ought not to be civilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French cultome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counfaile of God. But you will fay; That thefe discourses favour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize, to feare Got or Hell; whereas he that a is truly, wife, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing also tabe frared. For against an Enemies (word wee shall findeten thouland seven-pento-men (waged at that price in the warres) that feare it as little, and perchance leffe, shamany profest Sword-man in the World. Diligentisma in tutela fui Fortitude; Fortitude is a diligent preserver of it salfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritic between doubting and daring. Sicul non Martyrem pona: sienea fortem pugna; sed coufa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr : fo it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good caufe. In which who foeuer thall refoluedly end his life, refoluedly in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrie: as hee may justly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious 40 hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe we indeede take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs. by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to give him, of whom we would bee reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our owne consciences; animala, in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and bloud of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their bonours, being prest with injuries ? I fay that I doe not; if the injuries bee violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is affailed, in the flaughter of the Affailant. You will secondly aske 50 me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentle-man, being challenged by Cartel by one of like qualitie, bee not bound in point of honour to fatisfie the challenger in private combat? I answere that he is not : because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can judge it, which can destroy it; except you will still those Artes honourable, where the Hangi man gives the Garland. For, feeing the Lawes of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to second the Conquerour; and the Lawes of God appointed the Devill to fecond the conquered dying in malice. I fay that he is both bafe, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel to accompanied. To this perchance it will bee anfwered, That the Kings of England, anthorner Christian Kings, have feldome taken any fuch advantage over men of qualture; who wport caren retimes have flaine their private enemies. It is the that as incines of trouble and combustion they have not often done it; fo did our Noble menend Gentle then in former ages, in all important injuries, fue vinto the King , to approve themselves by battalle and publique to combat. For as they dared not to brackthe Law's fo did they diffaine to fubmit themselves to the shamefull revengethereof; the same revenge (Berause it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-pursse or other Theeues, Nav let it be granted that a pardon beconsocured for fach offenders; Yet's not the Manflaier freed by his pardon. For the forewore medies thath the partie grieued not withstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Affize, or by battaile, upon his ap. peale, which (faith St. Thomas Smith) is not denied and he further faith I for I vie his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to wit the Man-flaier) be continued either by Great Affize or by Battaile woon that appeale I the Man flater shall die notwithflanding the Princes pardon. So tauourable (kith the fame learned Gentleman) 20 are our Princes, and the law of our Realme : to justice, and to the punishment of bloud violently flied. It may further be demanded how our Noble men's Gentle men thall be repaired inchonour, where an enemie, taking the flare either in worder or blowes, thall lay on them an inflame vinfufferable to I fay what a Marthall Court will eafily gine fatisfaction in boths. And if wee hold it no difgrate to fill mit our felues for the recoverie of our Dubes, Goods, and Lands, and for all things elfe, by which the lives of our febres, our wines, and children , are fuffaired ; to the Judges of the Law i because it that bee fellonie; to take by violence even that which is our owned why should incondrate bubmic our feities to the Hudges of honourin cases of honour because to recour our reputation by strong hand, may be awarder? But yet 10 againg it may be objected. That the leffe of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the loffe of our goods, of our lands, or of our lines; and I fay fo too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to bee fo deare vitto vs., other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and under-taken for the publike good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he looseth his honor. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult; because even and equall in persons and 40 armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marfhall of England hath power to faue ouery mans fame and reputation, as farre as reputation may fuftaine in lurie by wordes, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill wordes that we haue giuen, and to confelle that we haue done him worng to whom we haue giuen them, is a fufficient faits faction; and as it may fall out, more than fufficient. For hee that gives ill wordes in choller guad fuddenly, denies them, or repents himfelfe of them you adulfement; hath the difaduantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeeded not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompense will bee made 50 for them; that all appeare by a notable example of a molt worthis Gentleman Monniform doubter that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was given him by a sudgement of the Constable and Marsfhalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue indge

ment . M. de Plesis was set in a chaire under the degrees where the Contable and Marshalls fate : the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a fword with the point towards himfelfe. and in his left hand the like cudgell or baltinado, wherewith he had stricken AL de Plefis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plefis hands, submitting himselfe to such renenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls having formerly left it to the will of Plefis to vie his owne difcretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one before hand in point of honour, who struck M. de Plesses, like to a Ruffian comming behinde him, and (having advantage of companie, and his horses readie) shifted himselfe away on the suddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner : Or whether Monsieur de Plesis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre juster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemie, but forgave him; let any wife man judge. To this if it be faid, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no difgrace vnto him: I answere, that one may say as well, that it is no difgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallowesto repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enan forced repentance is no diffrace in respect of the force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our finnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted upon vs for formewhat unworthie of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay voluntarie repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth cither out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainely, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie injuries or fuddaine injuries, that are not offered from malice forethought, then reuenge them: fo men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valour; and rather defire, that thereby the world should beleeue them to be of great daring, than know any fuch refolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe an indeede to be a valiant man, scornes to hunt after the opinion.

Now the fame power which the Contrable and Marthalls of France have, hath alfo a Marthall of England, or his Deputies; by whose indegement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preserved; wee may therefore as well submit our selves to the ludge of honour in all disputes of honour, as wee doe submit our selves in all controverties of livelihood and lift, to the ludge of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chevalricia England, in France, and eschwhere; was not less chairtable than politice. For the bloud of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honic bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sling but the singers or the face: but it produce that monstrous Beats, Reweige, which hath shung do to death, and eaten up of several Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more launentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon supreme Governours, than the cermission.

His Majeflie therefore (which Hemie the fourth of France all 6 endeuoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian like deede in Seatland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessor sould neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly send; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for ever-more. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse happie in preventing the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outragious varguistics of Duelliss.

Vnto this that I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be cadded, Take ach of the sear of great Latitude, and worthie of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lessels, in their several degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessaries upon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and witnesses: the former fort, being excusable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No leffe, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or perinfidias; though our Lawes doe not much diffinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, for saking his owne priviledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the fword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poiloning; and by the pen, or by practife. For such distinction is found, betweene comming presumptuously vpon a 10 man, to flay him with guile; and lying in wait for bloud, prinily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spred before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestic now raigning, have given notable testimonie of their justice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talard : who being (faith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee , & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauour with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the handes of the Hang-man. Queene Marie, vpon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects 20 very deare vnto her. His Maiestie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no leffe ancient and faithfull, than himfelfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poifon, and of punishment following fuch wicked Artifans; euery Age hath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Judge) the Authour of the French Recherches gives vs two notable inflances: the one of des Efbars, who (faith Pafquire) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maistre de France, pour contente l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolastre : & Dieu permit que depuis il sut pendu & estrangle ; Who caused Montaigu great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eshars worshipped as his Idol : but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone af- 20 ter hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Paret: who, to fatisfie the Kings passion, practifed the destruction of the Admirall Chabet, a man most nobly descended, and of great service. For as in other men, fo in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, prefuming vpon the great good service which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marfeilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and defired nothing fo much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King (it being cafie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and 40 other Judges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is rare in men towards the Law ) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with fome of the Judges with fo great cunning; with others, with fo sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as, albeit nothing could be proved against the Admirall, worthic of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating fallhood in fo great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignement, and condemnation? Belle legon certes (faith Pafquire) à tout Juge pour demourer 50 tousiours ensoy, & ne laisser fluctuer sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imaginaire saneur, qui pour fin de jeu le submerge ; A faire lesson to all Iudges , to dwell alwaies in them-

felues, and not to fuffer their consciences to float upon the waves of imaginarie fauour, which in the end overwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall : though it might have beene antiwered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as undeferued. That he was tried, according to his owne defire, by the Lawes of his Countrie, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings justice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue back vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chofen Conful.

Home C.

THe last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the Reople, and mutinic of his Souldiers. He fell dangeroufly fick, in such fort, that the rumor of his death ranne current throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettic Kings, that had for laken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainely perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightieft in all Spaine. But feeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best; to take the present aduantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rathly fell vpon the Sueffetani and Sedetsni. Confederates of the Romans; and waited their Countrie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Sucro, in flead of making head against these Rebells, grew to be affected with the like diftemper. They had not reaped fuch profit of their Roman conquests, as might fatisfie their defires; or as they thought calle to bee gotten, if they might betheir owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported: they thought, that the time ferued very well, to enrich themselves with spoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, drining away their Colonells, that should have bridled their furie a they chose out of their owne number two base fellowes, Albim Calenus, and Atrius Finber, to their Com-20 manders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chofen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whilest they were deuising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of them felues, in a time of fuch combuffion, as was expected; there arrived more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Golonells, sent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of confideration, and feeming to bee glad that they had no further ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Stifie had refolued to doc exemplarie justice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them 40 in feare, of what they had deferued. Therefore hee caused Syllan us to make readie the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and indibilis; He caused Albius and Atrius with some thirtie other of their Complices, to be fecretly apprehended in their lodgings. He called the Mutiners to affembly; and having them ynarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; hee bitterly inneighed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albim, and Atring, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Romm cuftome toward fuch offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew: and received e-50 uery man his pay when he was fworne.

Mandanius, and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet; but by the feueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers; they stood in feare, as Scipio obtaines lesue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Massan sanissa who io yned with Scipio. The victories against Asdrvbal and Syphax.

VB. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, and P. LICINIUS CRASSUS, entring into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should bee allowed, to be show part of the monie which he had brought out of Spaine into the treasurie; vpon the fetting forth of folemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whileft he was buffed in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reviue the memoric of his victories alreadie gotten; and to give hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish embassages availe much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deferuedly; faying, That they were the most happie of all their Countition, since they being present, had seene him chosen Conful, and should carrie home such joy full newes. The Saguntine Embassadours, were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though coffly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deferued. Neuertheleffe, when Sosno pio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince : there wanted not many, even of the principall men, that vehemently gainefaid him. Of thefe was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who feemes to have been troubled with that difcase; which too often causeth men renowned for long approued vertue, to looke asquint upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleaged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul : whereof the chiefe were, That the treasurie was vnable to suitaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard forgreat forces, where they could not at pleafure beerecalled, vnto the defence of Rome it felfe, if neede required. Hereunto he added many wordes concerning the danger wherein Halie flood, not only of Hannibal, but of Maon go his brother, that was arming the Ligus jans : as also concerning the honour of the Conful; which would (he faid) be greater in fetting Italie free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spanifb warres, as of leffe moment than the intended voiage against Carthage: nor withall to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having furered Afdrubal to paffe into 114lie: the wing, that it was greatly to be feared, least the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, not with It and ing the good fuccesse of Scipio (if it happed to bee good) might be fent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilft the Roman forces were emploied abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that years 40 a Province: which the Conful neuerthelesse propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter alreadie concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other fide, infifled your this one point; That it was better to make an offenfine, than a defenfine warre; especially against such as the Carthaginians; who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of monie, with levies made abroade. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Golleague, would bee as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiling to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home; and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuic of Fabius, which withflood fuch a gallant enterprise; hee proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the to manner of his proceeding: for a fmuch as it was notifed abroad, that if hee could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carrie it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who referred in this honorable man a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates Aaaaaa and found them in a Valley, that was fearce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and fending Lalius with all his horfero feeth a compalie about the fulls, and charge them in rearcy he ouer threw them. Indivision and Mandamus had after this no hope remayning, to preferue them felues and their effates, otherwise than by making film iffion. Mandamus therefore came to spipe: and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfle, and for his brother malibila, obtayned his request, yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves less free Princes, then they formerly had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gade: and was met on the way by Masmilis; to

who fecretly promifed to doe him all feruice, if the People of Rome would fend him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gaules, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasurie, or the Temples. In his voiage thence, heclanded at Carthagena: hoping to haue taken it by furprise. But hee failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his ta- 20 king leave of them, would not fuffer him to enter againe into their Citic. By this heeforesaw, that it would not bee longere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, hee allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voiage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Island Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, prefently after the departure of Mage. Then did Schipie deliuer yo the Province, to those that were fant from Romes Couccede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied to him: for that it had as yet been egranted who no Procondial; excepting to such, as received that dignitive after a Consulhin, as it were by prorogation. But to makeamends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie? P. Cornelius Schipie was chosen Consuls and P. Lieinius Crassius joy-ned with him. This Crassius, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Roman's; might not, by the cultomose of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superfiction: though Casar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were stated by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that his Scheage desiring to haute the Warre transferred into Assiria, was into a danger to loose that honourable charge, by any 40 milchance of lot, in the distillion of Prounincies; for that his Scolleague was notes.

good will and pleafure; whereby hee obtained thus much, That the Isle of said might be appointed vnto him for his Province; with leave to paffe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of monic, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate have little care to turnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Here. withall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the fuddaine from the Baleares to Genua. and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no leffe terrible inuation vpon Italie, than that which Afdrubal had lately made. He could not indeede raife any great Armie of the Liquians; for that he found them diffracted with civill warres. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time, than he could willingly have spared : yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnfteadie Gaules readie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay readie to be emploied where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lona bardie, and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed a. way in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him fent thither (the report is vicertaine) loaden with the bootie that hee had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much difable him: and though after awhile, there came letters from Carthage, together with 20 ftore of monic, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africk, disturbed all; and made him bee recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeare. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have beene pleased to take notice. Only it is faid, that he foent the former by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where hee raifed an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the hight of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the looling hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great peffilence, infeffing both the Carthaginian, and the Roman Campe, is faid to have beene the occasion of this yeares idlenesse: which fell not out much amisse for the Citic of Rome, that was marualloufly emponerished by this warre; and had alreadic tried the vtmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeares fince confileated) should bee fold, or let out : in which bargaine, that the Citie might receive no loffe; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other monie, none was given to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make preffe of Souldiers for his African voiage; neither did hee ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him : or rather they did it for themselues; that were therein wifer than the Senate. It is vsually found in Councells of estate; that the busic, or obstinate heads of a few, doccarrie all the reft. And many times, men make a furrender of their owne judgements, to the wifedome that hath gotten it felfe a name, by giving happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, hee that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde him felfe deceived: the counfaile of those many being wholly directed by the empetr of a few, that ouer-fway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time : for his warie nature forted well with the bufineffe, 50 that fell out in the chiefe of his emploiment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fulsius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduife, and deliberate, yet could well appre hend)

apprehend) embraced the needfull refolution of Scipio: in fuch fort, that belides his Raman forces, he had from divers parts of Italie about feven thousand Voluntaries. He had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for failes, Axes, Beede hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of thips, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Speares of all kindes : every placefurnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could affoord. Vnto this willingueffe of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of fine and fortig daies, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lanched, twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee transported his Armie into 10 Sicil. In Sicil he found, belides other forces, two Legions, that had ferued at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as hee himfelfe well knew) not guiltie of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heavie censure. They had scrued under Marcellus, and Lauinus; at the taking of many Cities, and strong peeces; in which regard, they were like to bee of good vie to him in Africk; where would bee flore of fuch emploiment. For increasing the number of his horse, hee pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthic yong men, and fuch as loved well their eafe. Thefe he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment : but with condition, that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen; which hee brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilest hee an was providing, to have things in a readinesse for Africk; the banished Locrians that followed the Roman fide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Caribaginians in one of the Citadells of Lorie (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might beranfomed, and rewarded. Scipio being advertised of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surprifed. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison: which fent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like fort, fearing least their owner paucitie, should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The 30 Townesmen, were doubtfully affected : but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio incustodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Loerians ynto the Roman Senate; not only against those of the Garrison, but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the reft. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proferpina, that had a great fame of fanctitie, was spoiled by these barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore adulfed the Senate, to make present ato mends to the Goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint; comforted the Locrians, and redreffed the injuries done vnto them; fent for Pleminius, with other principall the offenders, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proferpina her monie twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed fuch a manin Locri; and had not carefully hearkned to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp inucctive that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased: as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against to the diffolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sieil, neither mindfull of any feruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so farrevrged, that ten Legates were sent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Adiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit: The end of all was: they found him fo well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journie; and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had alreadie emploied Lalius in Africk; rather to make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie : and firuck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who faw their affaires to be evpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journie was, That speaking with Majanisja, he well in. formed himselfe of the state of Africk; and knew what was to bee expected of those two Kings, that had promifed to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissahis revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made 10

under-hand with the Romans .: Livie doth professe, That there was no such cuident

cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inseriour to Liuie, both in Worth and Time) gives one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belong. ing, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessarie truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to paffe, that the knowledge of fuch a matter should have escaped the diligence of Linie, if it had beene true : vnleffe wee should beleeve. that he wilfully forbare to rehearfe a Tragedie; the forrow whereof would cause Appian.Alex. men to thinke amiffe of Scipio. Howfoever it was, thus * Appian tells it: and many 10 circumstances of things done confirme it. Afdrabal, the sonne of Gifco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Mafanissa loued. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Afarubal to be his sonne-in-law. When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great feruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the mariage of Afdrabals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Mafamilla therewithall. This they did, for that syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemic. Hereof Malamile was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he 20 thought; yet not so secretly, but that some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveighed himselfe homein to his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleeve Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things paft, and following. Only it feemes, that howfocuer Sophonisbathe daughter of Aforubal, was promifed by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet fince this their courtesse proceeded from scare, He thought it wildome to continuc and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; until A SDRVBAL had fent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was confummated. In other matters concerning the warre it ielfe, wherein Appian differs much from Linie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken peeces of his works 40 remaining) Linie did follow; it will be no offence, to take litle heed vnto his reports. Mafaniffa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crowne descended, by order of the Countrie, vnto Desales the brother, not vnto Me fanisha the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanisha shortly died and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebeli that made himselse Protector over the yonger which was a child. The Traitorsortified himselfe against Masanisa, whose returne bee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not ferue: He, and his Pupill, were disposfeffed of their Estates by Majarifa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should hauebeene 50 glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not beene guiltie of the injurie ly them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Cosen raigned, and hee seemed unlikely to fland them in any slead, But Syphan, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Corrival

warred upon him; and oner-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheleffe Mafaniffa still retayned the hearts of his people; and hereby remayned strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the leffer Syrtis, betweene the borders of the Cartharanans and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans; vet fo, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrie, euen as farre as to Hippo; and when Leline arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him, to haften on Scipto to the inualion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good succelle, than could be expected from the good will of poore Majaniffa; fent an Embaffage into Sicil about the fame time, which was little pleafing vnto Scipio. He excufed himfelfe of his promife lately made: and fignified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That hee could not choose but fight for the defence of Africke, wherein he was borne and raigned; and for defence of his beloued wines Countrie, if it were inuaded. Neuertheleffe he promifed to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This mellage haltned Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised affistance of Syphax had not a intle advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the aftent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Aduenturers. Lest therefore the failing of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way, to preuent all discourse, and set the warre undertaken immediately on foot. The Embasfadours he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to confider, that what he had promifed he had also fworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having fent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voiage; which he intended no longer to deferre. For, faid he, Mafaniffa hath beene with Lelius : and Syphan hath newly fent to me; greatly wondering vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, that they will o provide for them felues, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the meffage of these Embassadours; whose followers had beene seene walking vp and downe Spracuse. And left any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the bulineffe, Scipio immediately fent about his fleet vnto Lilyboum; and requesting by letters At. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicil, to meet him there; halted thither with his Armic. At Lilybeum he agreed with the Pretor, about the division of the Legions betweene them; which to leave behinde for defence of the Hand; and which to carrie with him into Africk. What numbers hee transported, it is not certaine: fome Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twentie 40 hundred horse; others increasing them to fine and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them downe : since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when he tooke his voiage into Spaine, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set downer by an Historian, who borrowed them from Lime, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Armic landed in Africk, neare vnto a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme, because it is uncertaine, whether it were that to Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arrivall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinkes the faire Promontorie to have beene the fame. that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficultie Masanissa might come Aaaaaa 2 thither from the leffer Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But for almuch as without any memorable impediment, foone after his arrivall, Scapio encampi dbefore Vices, that flood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: It may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were fent, the next day, fine hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roued about the Countrie with a troupe of horse. to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vfually reforted, like as before he had met with Lelius at Hippo that was farther off: as it would have beene for Scipio, with his Armic and Carriages, to ouer-comethe trouble of a long journie, and fetch a great compasse to Vica by Land; when hee might have disembarqued nearer vnto it. Neuerthelesse it may passe as a conjecture. That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the leffer Syrtis; fince he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybaum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrie thereabout was very rich, and fit for fustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make relistance. Thus much perhaps Mafaniffa had fignified vnto Lelius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, how socuer they made braue promifes, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee faw their fleet and Armie to be fuch, as not only served to invade the Lands of Carthage, but 10 threatned a conquelt of the Citic, and whole Estate : then might hee better adule them to fet faile for Vica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthagenians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to bee leuied in halte. If drubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately been chaced out of Spaine by Scipio, was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanne and his fellowes, of whose faction he was or it ought were wanting in him, yethis Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinitie of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was at that present with the King his sonne-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Sy- 20 phax and to him, informing them of the Inuation: entreating the one of them to giue affillance; and comanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be readie, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and flaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, belides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which he conneighed aboard his Hulkes or ships of burden, and sent them back loaden into Sicil. Hee tooke likewise a Towne called Salers; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose service being sitter for the field, than for defence of walled pla- 40 ces; made Scipio to perceiue the vnskilfulnesse of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he fent Masanissa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a Brauado, trained out the improvident Hanno fo farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was eafily gotten; and Hanno either taken, or flaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Towne; which prefently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vites, a Citic of great importance, * of which mention hath beene formerly made; and fate downe before it. Fortie daies hee spent about it : affailing it both by Land and Sea, and vling all his engines of batterie whereof hee had plentie; yet was in no likelihood of prenailing. And now the Sommer was quite spent : so that it was time 50 for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which must bee well stored against the yeare following. Whilest thus necessitie vrged him to leave Vius: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there : Astrabal and Syphan gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leave the fiege. Afdrubal had made a Leuie of thirtie thoufand foot, and three thouland horse; yet adventured not with this ill-trained Armicto draw neare vnto the Romans, before the comming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage liftie thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joyning vnto the forces of Afdrabal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the bankes of an Inler, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foor-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottome of the Creeke he mored his ships; 10 and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the fleet. The whole Campe he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the yeare, when it thould ferue him againe to fight. Of cattaile and other bootie Masanissa had brought in great flore; by driving the Countrie, before the comming of Afdrubal and Syphan. Corneal fo he had gotten fome: and great store was sent him from Sial and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Strainia: though scarce enough to serue turne; for that it was a matter of more cost, The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare; especially with Captines, to bee fold for slaues. Afdrubal and Syphax encamped near vnto Scipio : not fo strongly fortifying themselves, 20 as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the feuere institution, which the Romuss vied in discipline of Warre; or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to iffue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter paffed without action.

When Spring drew neare; Scipio thought it good to affay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was confidered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphan had given proofe before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe : and being peraduenture no leffe wearie with fatietic of his wife, who 20 had caused him to enter into this warre : Hee might bee moved with a little entreatie, to with-draw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that fuch a friend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honored in the Citie of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleafed him, or as he had beene inuited, to make a step thither and repose himfelfe awhile : his wife Queene Sophonisba lying also there at the same time, to cherilh him in his resolution. How socuer it were, Syphae did only make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italie by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like fort should quietly depart out of Africk; and so mak : an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africk and Europe 40 were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first give care: yet being pressed earnestly by many melfages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadours: He beganne to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great defence of earth, full of woodden Cabbins, and couered with boughes: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed courrings of Mats and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelefly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to fet their campson fire; and thereby give them 50 anotable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, Hee foresaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serve. It was a plaine open Countrie wherein he lay : and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be refifted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought

vpon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himfelfe, to make fome fudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end hee fent many Embaffadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended furprife. With these Embassadours he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers difguifed like flaues; that wandring (as it were) idlely vp and downe the Campe, might observe the waies and entrances, with what soeuer else was needfull. When hee had learned as much as hee defired : woon the fudden hee fent word to Syphan, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, for a fmuch as he could not get the confent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the 10 end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his deligne in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Adrubal and Syphax were very pentiue; as having lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better: they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his campe; and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refufall of peace, as did M. Atilius after the like prefumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches: what elfe remained than to beliege him? which they themselues were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginian fleet thould doe by Sea, that was making readie for the purpole. By fuch discourses these two comforted themselues; 20 recompencing in conceipt the loffe of their hopes path, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed : for that, confulting about the future, they provided not against present danger; but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipia, Hee was not idle: but made preparation out of hand; as it were to doc fomewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made readie; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon hee lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keepe fecret that which he had in hand, left being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemie might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vica from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leave behinde him in 20 his campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readie for the journie. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vnto the defence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him feuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vidertake himselse with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lelius and Masanissa, whom hee fent before him to set vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might feeme to have taken hold by casualtie upon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Afdrubal, it would bee suspe- 42 Acdas the doing of enemies; and gine Syphux warning to looke vnto himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire vnd foftly; that Lalius and Masanissa, who had a longer journie, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discouered, might have time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of Syphan beganne to blaze: which not only the N umidians, but their King himfelfe, imputed vnto cafualtie; as thinking themselves safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfeasleepe; and others, that had sitten up late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But such was the tumult, that they neither could 50 rightly understand in what case they were; nor give remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the fudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vponthe Enemies fword, which was readic to receme them. Especially Malaniffa, that best knew the Countrie, did great execution vpon them; having laid all the waies, by which he forefaw that they would feeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: fo that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would ferue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart : where, fearcleffe of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the slame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell outright as Scipto would have it. Hee therefore loft no time: but fetting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, to he killed fome, and purfued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Afarubal feeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make relistance, but shifted only for himfelfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had beene taken in fuch a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanne would have judged him worthie to be crucified. It would then have been faid, That with leffe than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, hee might at least haue given some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires, had he not beene only carefull how to faue his owne fearefull head. Nevertheleffe Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have beene true, That if Marubal, Except. 2 Pal. or any of those about him, would have striven to shew valour, when the camp was 46-14. once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good; because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not neede to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that confumed them; which (as Polybins affirmes) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to fay, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied A drubal and Syphax in their severall waies of flight.

Belides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Aumidians, that faued themselues in the darke: but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Surely it must needes have beene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made 20 away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Linie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius; may seeme to have followed fome leffe worthie Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in cafling up the fumme. For hee reckons only two thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, to have escaped; fortie thousand to have perished by sword or fire; and aboue fixe thou fand to have beene taken prifoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre thort of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes. Aldrubal, putting himselfe into the next Towne that was very strongly fortified; thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good lei-40 fure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot. and fine hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne, if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to veeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw that the arrivall of Scipio would soone give an end. Wherefore, left they should lay hold upon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; Hee shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the Towne, which hee left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first comming; and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adjoyning would needes bee valiant, and make countenance of warre ; but ned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege The Carthaginians were fore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for they heard newes of such a their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abando-

Scipio, having thus gotten the mastrie of the field, tooke counsaile about the profecution of the Warre. It was refolued vpon as the best course, That hee himselfe, with part of the Armic, should attempt the Cities round about him : and that Ma- 50 famiss, with his Numidians, and Lalius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphan; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice it feemes that Mafaniffa gave : who knew best the qualitie of the Numidians;

and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victorie. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne Kingdome, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no leffe concerned the Romans at the prefent, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded , Lelius was sent away with Mafamilla: and Scipio stated behinde; carrying the warre from Towne to Towne. Many places yeelded for feare : many were taken by force : and all the fubjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelitie; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid vpon them, for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italie. What to doe in this cafe the carthaginians could hardly refolue. Fortune was their Enemie: they had loft their Armies, and many of their Townes; neither durft they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or monie; who neuerthelesse of their owne free will were likely to give little helpe. Very much it grieved them, to fend for Hannibal out of Italie: yet fince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Armie; it was decreed, that Embassadours should bee forthwith fent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to fet out a fleet against that of Scipie; that rode before Viica, weakely manned, and cafe to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the Citic of Carthage: vpon the fafetic whereof they faid that all depended; adding, that whileft they were true, and at vnitic among themselves, they might well enough sublist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counfailes were not rejected : but order was forthwith taken, both for all thinges concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Viica. Neuertheleffe it was confidered, that hereby they should only protract the warre: without any way aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie; no. though it thould fall out, that all the ships at Vtica might bee taken or destroyed. Wherfore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Africk, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooto ner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselues to the execution of that which was decreed: fome, to fortification of the Towne: fome, to make readie the Fleet; and fome, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themselues for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those daies very strong; and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defencible peece adjoyning, He cafily tooke; the Garrison forfaking it, and running away, as foone as he drew neare. But whileft hee was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the Citie: He might perceive the Carthagmian fleet setting forth, and making towards Vica: What this meant, he readily conceived: and flood in great feare, lett his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being 40 heavily loden with engines of batterie, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for affaulting the Towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall service. Wherefore hee hasted away towards Vices, to affift with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, hee should have come too late. Neither could be indeede have beene there in due time; if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence, as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way : and at their comming to Vica, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; presenting themselues in order of battaile, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent : He thought it would bee sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sca: it should little availe the Carthaginians; if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden; and, fastning them together with cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge ouer

the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thou fand of his choice men, with store of Darts and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces hee left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and back againe vpon any advantage or neede: but theie he couered with plankes; vling the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it felfe not be torne afunder. Scarce was this worke finished; when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the affaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that flood voon the bridge, had fure footing, and threw their weapons downwards with their whole strength and violence, which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and uniteadic, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, aduenturing forth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them: nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hookes, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw voon the masts and yards which serued as Arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all afunder; in fuch fort that one ship followed another, and 20 all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to faue themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them entouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but having haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their well-come was greater than their victorie: because among so many grieuous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whileft things thus paffed about Can thage; Lelius and Mafaniffa, in their journie against Syphax, found as good successe as could be defired. The same of the victories alreadic gotten, reflored Mifamija to his Kingdome, without further contention: 20 the Malafili, his subjects, joyfully receiving him; and for saking the V surper. But here they staied not : neither indeede would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had fuch abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past; and, therefore being follicited by Afarubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre, But belied the initigation of his beloued wife; the loffe of the Mafafili would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masanista, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no leffe vnwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession; bee the title vnto fome part neuer fo vnjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the yong Kite: which 40 thought that shee had vomited up her owne guts; when it was only the garbage of some other fowle, that shee had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the yong Kite, beleeved the Kingdome of the Mafafyli to be part of his entrailes: Lalius and Mafaniffa will shortly give him somwhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesses (if it might be) that King: whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had been converted into strong enmitic; as also to fet in his place another, who might doe them fuch good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How eafily this might be effected, Mafaniffa knew belt: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this to day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphaz: who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman

Centurion, long agoe fent vnto him out of Spaine from Cn. Scipio. But though hee could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight couragiously. They were a rabble of all forts, gathered vp in hast : and few of them had feene the warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly that some small Troupes of Horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way; and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmilly, more and more were drawne out from ejther Campe: fo that at length Syphan, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemie, came vp with all his Horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouercharged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre leffe. But whilest he was profecuting his hope of victorie : fome Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of Horse; which fell to the fides, and made a lane for them. So their Battaile standing now more firme than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine to make them give ground. Mafanifalikewife, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this assistance : and charging afresh the Enemie, that could not make way forward, caused him to give back. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified fo the Numidian Horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphax have flayed them from flight; and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out vnhappily, that he was cast from his Horse, which received a wound; and so taken prisoner. Of others that were flaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they for sooke the place, and fled : and that their King, vpon whom all depended was in the Romans hand. Mafanisla told Lalius, That this victoric should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe Citic of the Kingdome; whither her himfelfe defired to be fent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hercunto Lalius agreed. Masanista comming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee; wherein by many faire promifes and threats, but e-30 specially by showing vntothem syphax bound, he prevailed so far that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and every one strove to get his favour, that was like to betheir King hereafter, Among the reft, Queene Sophonisba yeelded her felfe into his hands : and vehemently befought him, that the might not be deliuered vo vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beautic, so commended her suit, that Masanilla forthwith granted it; and to make good his promife, married her himfelfe that verieday: thereby to prevent Lelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, fince the was his wife. But Lelius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainoufly; fo that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphan and other prisoners, and have sent her vnto Scipio. But being over-entreated by Malanilla, hee fuffered the matter to rest awhile as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he fent away Syphax and other Captines immediatly; following shortly after himfelfe with Mafanissa, when they had done what was needefull in the Kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax there was great toy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipie and Afdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and pelent fortune; miniftring to enery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him not only to for fake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, unprouoked. He briefely answered, T hat his wife had moued him so to doe: calling her a Funic, and a pestilent creature : and saying, That Masanissa was no wifer than himselfe; since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled : and stood in great doubt, left this perilous woman should depriue him of Masanilla, as thee had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Mafaniffa and Lalius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcommed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masaniffa apart, hee brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romanshad title to her head; and that the was a mischieuous enemie of theirs. Wherefore hee entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memorie of his great feruices alreadie done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept : and finally promifed to be gouerned by Scipio; whom he nevertheleffe to entreated, to thinke vpon his faith given to Sophonisba, that she should not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where after fome time spent in agonie, he called vnto him a scruant of his, that had the custodie of his povfon ( which Princes then vied to have in readines, against all mischances that might make them vn willing to live): and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, fent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would have had her to line with him as his wife: but fince they who had power to hinder him of his defire, would not yeeld thereto. he fent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the handes of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to takeor-

At the receit of this Message and Present, shee onely said, That if her Husband had no better token to lend vnto his new wife, shee muti accept of this; adding. That shee might have died more honourably, if shee had not wedded so latelybefore her Funerall. And herewithall shee boldly dranke off the poison. This Linie reports it. But Appian varies from this: and fets it downe agreeably to that which hath beene spoken before, concerning the pracontract betweene Masanisa and Sophonisha. Hee faith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Chita met with Lelius and Mafaniffa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their Citie, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisha, for her owne primate, fent meffengers to excufe her marriage with syphax; as made against her will, by compulsion of those in 30 whose power the was. Mafaniffa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted herto wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphan, how cunning in perfwafion Sophonishs was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage: he fell out about her with Misanissa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootie belonging to the Romans. Mafaniffa faid, flee was his owne wife, and vnto him betro hed many yeares before. But Saipio would not heare of this: or if it were true; yet he faid it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in posfession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall hee sent to fetch her away: and Majaneffa accompanied the meffengers, as it were to deliver her; but making her requainted with the necessitie, gaue vnto her a cup of poison, wherewith siece ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed vnto the Romans her dead bodie; which he royally enterred. The fudden violence of Mafaniffa his love, and the readic confent of Sophonisha to marrie with him : adde not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evidenreause (which a Linie notes) of the sudden falling out betweene him and the Carhazinians; under whom he had bin trained up, & don them great service. Howfocuer it were: Scipio, hearing of this tragical laccident, fent for Atsfanissa, and comforted him as well as he could sleft his melancholic should lead him to some inconuenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Armie: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had descrued of the Citie of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gaue vnto him a Crowneofgold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the readie way, to divert his thoughts from the fadde remembrance of that which was past; unto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to fmile

This was the first time that the Komans tooke vpon them to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Masanisa well descrued : yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should he haue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recovered possession of his Countrie, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemes not vnlike-10 lie, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselse with his Troupe of Horse, in such sort as hee did before the comming of the Romans; hee might neuerthelesse hauerecouered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subjects, without other helpe, when syphax had once or twice been evanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deserved : neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunitie, than of such a man, vpon whom to beflow it, that was their affured friend, and paffable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Mafafyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the fame Nation. Yetthis liberalitie of the Romans, was noyfed abroad as verie glorious: and the Ro-20 mans themselues, in a politicke sort of grauitic, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their faluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great consequence. Hee thriued indeed well after it; and by their maintenance waxed mightie in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all fides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grow that Vermina the sonne of syphax (of whom wee shall shortly speake more) which held some pecce of his Fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserue their loue, requested there withall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of fuit: yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein; and answered very granely, That 30 it was not their custome to give the honour of that appellation, save onely vnto such Kings, as had greatly descrued of their Citie. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in procedle of time grew fo proud of this their imaginarie prærogatiue, that they imputed as a singular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vponthem, the salutation by b the name; though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or b cafas com profit thence redounding.

à. XİX. The Carthaginians desire Truce: and breakeit.

He Carthaginians were extremely difmaied, when they heard of the great calamitie, that was befalne their good friend Syphax; and undergreat calamitie, that was befalne their good friend 3) phax; and where flood that Majanija, their mortal lenemie, had got polleffion of his floor of their floors. Since their processing to Tanes in Kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in Kingdome. 1 o increate their reare, super the view of their Citie: where hee made an end of that Fortification, view of their Citie: where hee made an end of that Fortification, had neither which hee had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstandhim: but their hearts so failed them, that they fent forth vnto him thirtie Embassadors, Princes of the Citie, which were their O Privie Councell, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Supio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but killed the effect of him, exterpre Po-

feffed themselves to have vniustly broken the Peace between them and Rome ; and to have descrued what socuer punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly befought Scipio and the rest, that, in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would show mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their elemencie; which, by the follie of her Citizens, had now twice descrued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno and the choice of his companie; who had now their long defired worke in hand, of fuing vnto the Romans for peace. What focuer they were, it must needes be that they were most infolent men ouer those that were subject vitto their power; for they would not have made such adoration vnto the Romans, in their owne necessitie; vnlesse they themselves had expe-Eted the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not vhknow me to subjector to his assistants, in what poore case the Citie of Rome then was; and how viable to defraie the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in fuch ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had monie enough, wherewith to wage more men; they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; 10 and they had the Scafree. But they wanted the Roman resolution : and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage , though Viica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though so of ten victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submiffion, and told them That though he came into Africk, to make a Conquest, and not a Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, here would not denie to grant them the Peace, Which they defired, for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of justice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he imposed upon them, were these: That they should render up vinto him all prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and fugitive flaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland between Italie & Africk: That they should deliver up all their ships of warre, saue twentie; and T hat they should pay a great fumme of monie, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barlie. To confider of these Articles, hee gaue them three dayes : and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might fend Embaffadours vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Mulaniffa was difmiffed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the warre had beene alreadie at an end. Syphax was a little before fent with Lalius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy; and gaue hope, that the long endured miferies would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were fet open, and an holy day appointed for thank figuing and fupplication to their Gods. Lalius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa; who grarularing the happie successe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giving thanks vinto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vinto their Mafter, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him; who by rendring them to libertie, should doe an act verie plaufible that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Majaniffa in complement : but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should so doe for him; they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captiues; and fent him two purple Callocks, that had each of them one gold button; with fuch other Prefents, as in time of their pouerty might ferue to testific their good will. Scarcely were these and Lalius gone from Rome; when the newes came, that Embassadours from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadours were not admitted into the Citic, but were lodged without : vntill Lelius being fent for, came backe from Oflia, to be present when their demands were to bee heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that flood in the suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was Peace : but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was onely to winne time, and get respite from warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italie, either to chace the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Luctatius Gatulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they faid, all things well confidered, did ftill remaine in force: neither had there fince beene any warre at all, betweene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannbal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head belieged and razed the Towne of saguntum: and after that aduentured in like fort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Halie. This being to their Meffage was none other, than to defire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in sorce; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale; hearing these Embassiadours make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had beene foterrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Luchatius, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselues by their age : (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time; untill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in companie of Lelius; without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answere. This not with flanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate receiving advertisment Except Pepple from Scipio, of that which had passed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Lis. Treatie of peace, approued the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason be beleeued : fince it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battaile betweene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be auerse to them, their forces in Africk were nobetter than quite lost. Matters thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadours came backe frome Rome: a Fleet out of Sieil, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Africk to victualle the Roman Campe, was ouer-

taken by foule weather at Sea ; and hardly escaping wracke, was dispersed, and driuen aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuails in Carthage: which caused the people to Panico. crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a bootie escape them; faying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedie desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (20 it seemes) that all this discourse of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was Except Polys. the manner in Carthage, as like wife in Alexandria, for all the Rascalitic, together with 50 women and boyes, to be medling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Afdrubal, to gather up the differfed Roman ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recoursed the flation whereto their Campe adioyned) and Выбыбы з bring them into Carthage: which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relected; but for that by this breach of truce, he forefaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war. and put him to more trouble. Where for chee fent Embaffadours vnto them : both to require satisfaction for the injurie done; and to deterre them from entertaining anie other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gauethe Carthaginians to vinderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vinto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the peace; vpon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (faid they) we hold it strange, That yee, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before vs, and kissed our feet, after an unusuall manner of humilitie, confessing your 10 Selues to have perfidiously broken the league that was betweene ws, and thereby to have deserned such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soone forget what yee then uttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selues worthe to be destroyed, having only recourse unto our mercie. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which yerepoje in HANNIBAL that thus emboldens you. Tet were it not amiffe, that yee should consider, how long he hath beene pent up in a corner of Italie, among the Brutians, where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stirre: so that yee are like to sinde his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africke. and readie to give vs battaile: yet shouldst well agree with your wis dome, to doubt what might befall, remembring that he is aman, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were 10 ouercome; what refuge have yeleft unto your selves against hereaster? What gods will yee eyther sweare by, to bee believed, or call upon in your miserie? What wordes, and lamentable gesture willyee henceforth wse, to move compassion? Surely yee have alreadie wafled all your forces of perswasion, and shall not againe decine vs, if ye resule the grace, whereof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angrie, when they heard themselues upbraided with the base demeanour of their Embasfadours. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselues: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his Faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submiffion; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all instification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that 10 the Roman Embassadours were verie much delighted, in the rehearsall of that point which was yeolded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in so ill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the surie of the multitude was in some sort appealed; eyther by Hanne, whom Appian (I know not why) cals Hanno the great; or by the verie reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly fort; though it were without an swere to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe Convoy home; though with little intentof good vnto their persons. As drubal was then in the mid-way, as men failed from 40 Carthage towards Vica. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed; or whether directed by publike order, to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradus. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so tooke leave of them, as if they had been ethen in safetie; fince the Roman Campe was even in fight. The Embaffadours tooke this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, for a fmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Afdrubal fell vpon them in fuch manner, as they might well 50 discerne his purpose; which was, to have stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubel sthey flipt away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet hee gaue them chace; and had well neare furprifed them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shore over against them, and therefore adventured to run their vessell aground : whereby they faued their owne liues ; though a great part of their companie were flaine, or hurt. This practife of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driven to studie nothing else, than how to get the victorie, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same scare, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also have caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not been given to vnderstand, that Hannibal was alreadic landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more case conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

ò. XX.

In what fort HANNIBAL frent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of MAGO in Italie. HANNIBAL and MAGO called out of Italie. How the Romans were diversly affected by HANNI-BALS departure.

Ver fince the loffe of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countréy of the Brusium; waiting for another supplie from Carthage. The Rowan Consuls that succeeded vnto Clundus and Linius, by whom A shad was outcome and flaine, were contented to bee quiet all their yeare. Neither did Liamin the Colleague of Scipio ought worthie of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Conful who followed Licinius, and Cn. Ser-30 uilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were carneftly bent to have done formwhat : but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal. they had the better; in some, the worse : and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time so manie great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africk, wherein they were at no final charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happie conclusion. They stood neuerthelesse in much seare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal : who 40 tooke exceeding paine among the Ligurians and Gaules to raife an Armic, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe colde. Mago folicited alfothe Hetrurians; and found them foreadie to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could have entred their Country strong, it might have proved no lesse needful for scipio to return home out of Africk, than thortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Confuls or Proconfuls, with an Armic, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians; for a fmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which fide Mago would breake out. Being thus bufied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

50 As for Mago; when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he mee in the Countrie of the Infubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornellys the Roman Proconful and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfulls in fuch fort that the Roman Commanders beganne to distrust the iffue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout; and strained themselues hard; as if at that brunt the victorie should have beene carried before them But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beafts being fitter for fuch vie, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were feattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to mannage them. Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them : whole manner of fight was more availeable against those that were loose, than against the Troups that were close and thick. 10 Then felthe Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to give backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemie; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make refistance, they held their ground. The Proconful therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago faw that his men beganne to shrinke , Hee put himselfe in the head of his 20 Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length he received a grewous wound in his thigh, whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not withoutgreat coft; as purchasing the death of about fine thousand enemies, with the loffe of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconfuls Legions; also besides divers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of service. Neyther were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, be- 30 fore they had recoursed some ground that might assure them from pursuit. Howeuer it were, this victorie would have much imported for the affurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilear to abide therein. But Mago with drawing himfelfe (by casic journies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to understand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was readie to bee lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarqued shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. Fich heard it with great impatitence; gnalling his teeth, and graining, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readic to burft out, whileft the Embassadours were deliuering their errand. When their message was done, Hee told them, That his wayer plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bia me come home, hunlong ages done their best to hate me out of Italic; though mare, ciglely, and crookedly they went to worke, by slopping the supply, that should have enabled use to manage the Warre here. So I 10 o therefore, blad not need to bragge, that hee bath drawn me home by the best-sit with Hann 0, that hath wrought this noble fest; and onerwhelmed the Hause of the Barchines, for takes of other meanest educit, with the vume of Cartos these. He had before prepared a Flect in readincife, doubting that, which after came to passe; wherein he embarqued, besides his owne men, as many of the Haliam, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that strunke backe from him, and refulled tood efervice in this Expedition: of whom such as hee could takahe flew; not fparing those that fled into the Temple of Inno Launia, which had been held an inviolable Sanchuarie unto that day-lev was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Inle no less palionate, than men are wont to bee, when they leave their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked bake with the shore; accusing both pods and men; and curing his owne dulins (iii), the had not led his Armie from Canna, hotte and bloudied as it was, directly wrothe wals of Rome. With such vexation of fight Hee quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had lived almost halte his time.

If it could have been foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) leffe earneally haue preffed the Carthaginians to fend him ouer thither. When fure addertifement was brought vnto the Citic, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie art Holiday was appointed for thankleining vnto their gods ; & extraordinarie great factifices publikely made, for joy of fuch happic tidings. Yet old Que abitio was of opinion, That the danger did ftill remaine the fame, though the place were changed for that Hannibal, at his comming into Africk; would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had beene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countrie, than ever he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the warre from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped, was enough to make them prefume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Emballadors brought vnto them a great maffe of Golde and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine; onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the sugantines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed in time of more necessitie from private men. Hence also proceeded the seuere chastisement, laid vpon those twelve. Colonies, that for want cyther of meanes, or of good will, had refuled to give aid to the 20 Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had beene wont to fer our for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the verie most of their abilitie. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet futeable to the greatnesse of their fpirit) ypon the good successe of the Battaile at Metauris; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie', whereof Italie had beene few dayes fince discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to revolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the fame time) would bee found a true Prophet. For be-40 thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Afdrubal no specialtie of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were eyther of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rafcall multitude of halfe-fcullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a sit Captaine for such souldiors. Likewise Afdrubal, the fonne of Gifco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at fauing himselfe by a swift retrait. But now there came an Armie, of men hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, flelhed many hundred times in Roman blond, so and wearing the spoiles not onely of good fouldiors, but of braue Captaines, by them flaine. Such talke vsed the people of Rome, faying, That Scipio was like to meet in battaile, with many that had flaine Roman Prators, yea and Confuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had beene first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuctall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the feige of Townes; breifly, that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had ever served in warre, and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

HANNIBAL in Africke prepares to fight with SCIPIO: treates with him about peace in vaine; loofeth a battaile at Nadagara, and per/wades the Carthazinians to fue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

ANNIBAL disembarqued his Armie at Leptie, almost an hundred miles from Carehage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and fomewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill prouided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, fomewhat farre from the Ene-mie; that he might furnish himselfe with this and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Countrie; gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychaus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was faid to have in those dayes the best Horfes of scruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should bee easie for Masanissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as manie other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument and the same of him that yield it, prenailed with Treham; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetulius, (the same who had made himselfe Protectour ouer Masanissa his Cosens; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Namidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Hamibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the sonne of Syphas, a holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assaile the places that yeelded obedience to Majaniffa. This Vermina, as we finde in Livie, came with more than fixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hinnibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the flate wherein they were; that they could not attend the leifure of those preparations, which would have made the victoric affured. When they confidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whilest they had such a brane Champion aline, to maintaine their cause by warre.

But when they bethought themselues of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimitie to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out carneftly, that it was no time to linger, but prefently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, eyther good or bad. And to this purpole, they fent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answere, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since hee was General of their forces, He thought it refonable, that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuerthelesse, to give them fatisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his 50 Embassadours: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vinderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance, Wherefore hee fent vnto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out;

praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other butinesse a-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanilla had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him feruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces would little auaile him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africke. Wherefore taking fuch order as he could vpon the fudden, for the fafetie of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and fixe thousand Foot, hee made

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadours that had been at Rome, returned backe under the conduct of Lelius and Fulnies: who brought them fafeinto the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themfelues towards the Roman Embaffadours : they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answere for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion.

IM. Babius one of the late Embaffadours that had beene in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands upon them, and detained them; fending word vinto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might beer epaid in their owne Coyne, for the injurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to 20 heare of this; and commanded Behins to vie them with all possible courtefie, and fend them fafe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caufed them to acknowledge themselues, (which was a great victorie) farre lesse honourable than the Romans, This not with standing, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to facke, withouthearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towne by affault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatfocuer they were; without regard. This they did, to make them elues terrible: and the better to worke fuch impression in the mindes of those, with whom they had to doe, they yied oftentimes to kil the verie Dogges and other Beafts, that ranne Execut. & Po. 30 athwart them in the firects; he wing their bodies a funder, as men delighted in finedding of bloud. This being their practife at other times; it is likely, that now they omitted no pecce of crueltie; when they meant to give proofe of their vehement indienation, and reuengefull mindes, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were fo earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hamibal being encamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discouct where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trusfing them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleafure; appointing one to conduct them up and downe, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This 19 done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and fent them away fafe vnto their General. Hamibal understanding this, admired the brauerie and courage of his Enemie: with whom on the fudden he grew defirous to have an Enter-view, and personall conference; and fignified fo much vnto him, by a meffenger fent of purpofe. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answere, that Hee would meet him shortly in place convenient. The next day Mafaniffa came with his Armie : whom Scipio taking with him removed vnto a Towne called Nadagara, neare vnto which lice fat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence he sent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly ferue, if He had ought to fay to him. Hannibal thereupon remoo ued from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemie : where hee encamped well to his owe good liking in all things elfe; excepting that his men were driven to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of

Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well fearched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off : and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while filent viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian faluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Afric's and of Italie; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for fo manie Fleets as had beene loft, and of fo much bloud as had beene fhed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not bee recalled: He faid, That it was meet for them to confider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had beene exposed, by the greedie defire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was cuentime for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wifedome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and cuill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his mind upon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subject. Tet (faid He) mine owne example may peraduenture susficeto teach thee moderation. For I am that fame HANNIBAL, who after my victoric at Canne wanne the greatest part of Italie: and denifed with my felfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken, Once I brought mine Armie to your walles. as thou haft since brought thine to ours of Carthage ; but now, see the change! I standhere entreating thee to grant us peace. This may ferue as a document of Fortunes instabilitie. I fought with thy Father, Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generals, that ever met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I should have such businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is even one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof shee hath many. And thou maist have experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone? Thinke upon M. ATILIVS. If hee would have hearkened unto such perswasions, as I now vieto theezhe might haue returned home to Rome an happie man. And so maift thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How sail thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and what some Ilands else are situate betweene Italie and Africk, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever; and left with the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou halt have gloric enough by effecting thus much : and the Romans may well be glad of fuch a bargaine. Asfor vs : our owne quiet full henceforth give vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully observe the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too listle; I must defire thee to ponder will how great an hazzard thou must undergoe, for the obtaining of a vericlistle more, than that which thou maift have without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold upon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but till to morrow night, and thou must take such sertune. as it shall please the gods. The offue of battaile is uncertaine, and many times beguilethexpectation. Men and steele we shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of vs hath affurance. Let vs therefore without more a doe. make peace. And doe not tall me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I HANNIBAL that now defire peace with thee, which I would never doe, If I thought it not expedient for my Countrie. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it : like as I have maintained unto my power, as long as the gods did not envie mee, the Warre by meebegunne. Hereunto Scipio made answere, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spaine, which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the finall iffue of the Warres had approved, and would approve to be most just. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he faid, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of infolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all thefe Countries, with which the Carthaginians now fo willingly departed, were alreadie wonne from them by the Romans? If, faid Hee, theje Conditions had beene propounded whilest as yet you detained some part of Italie; the; might peradjuenture not have beene relected. But as the cafe now flands, I fee no reason, why I flould remit unto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians have reclaed alreadie, and thought mee to deale graciously in being fo moderate. Rather I far, that the injuries which they have done me fince, have made them unworthie of obtaining peace upon fo friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though thou woulded be 10 gladto make thy Citizens under fland, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes ealed. Oncly thou must thinke, that in like fort it concernes me in honour, not solet them bee estners or fauers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knoweft well, that, befides those offers which thou here hast made , they were well contented to restore unto us ransome-free all prisoners that they have of ours; to pay ws five thousand Talents; to deliver up their Gallies; and to deliner hoftages for affurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of allthis, by their breach of Truce; their foiling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embaffadours? Not fo. But if they can be contented, befides all this, to make fuch amends as I shall require, for these iniuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what an fivere to give you, otherwise, you may even prepare for warre, and blame your 20 owne felues , for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiors prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at breake ofday they issued into the field: a notable Match, and such as hath very selsome beene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner : placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples, or fmall Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triary. But herein 30 Scipio altered alittle the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastiti, that so the Hall sti, as was vivall, might fall backe betweene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, as it were in File. This Hee did because of the Elephants; wherof Hannibal had many. For of those beastes the danger was lesse, whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke fuch order, that when they had paffed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, Hee gaue direction, that when they found themselues ouer-charged, eyther by the Enemies, or (which was most to bee feaned) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able. should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armies there by leaving roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to faue themselues on the void ground, that was betwist the first and second, or the fecond and third Battailes, without cloying up the way betweene the Maniples; which he delired to kepe open. His Italian Horse he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Mafaniffa with his Numidians. He himfelfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vling words not many, but verie forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieued, fince their comming 50 into Africke. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end : and that their victorie in this warre, should make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to relift them. On the contrarie; if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neyther was there any place in

Afrisk, that would give them shelter; if they sell into the Cartheganian hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory: vnlesse they would live like wretched slaues vnder mott meretlesse Emmies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never been knowne to saide of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other tide placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore. in Front of his Battaile. Next behinde these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercinaries, Lieurians, Gaules, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battaile : which was of Carchaginians and Africans, more intereffed in the quarrell than were those Mercinaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately fent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Latine, in his own right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidianshe placed in his left wing against Masanissa. He was indeede farre too weake for the Enemie in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Mezetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the source thousand of Masanisa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than fuch as could be leuied in the hast of a few daies; and the remainder of those, that had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to flie. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serve on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to flay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Fermina the fonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with fixteene thou and and apwards, the most of them Horse: the advantage of number might have served wel to supplie all other defect. Yet fince the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay : Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselse, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their seuerall conditions: promifing vnto the Mercinaries bountifull rewards: threatning the Carthaginians with incuitable feruitude, if they loft that day; but especially animating his old fellow-fouldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make anestimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had flaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Reman Souldiers; even such, as for their dastardly flight out of fundric battailes, could no longer be trufted to beare Armes in their owne 40 Countrie. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chaced. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, upon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strine to make good their honour; and to purchase the same of men inuincible.

Such exhortations vsed the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew neare together: the Numidian Horsemen on both fides beganne to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other infirtuments of warre, sounded to bartaile: and Hamislasom manded his Elephants to breake upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an uncertaine kinde of helpe) those that flood neare unto the point of you were alwayes an uncertaine kinde of helpe) those that flood neare unto the point of you will be the same from the same flowing the same flowing that dail offerdered. Massing this signue charge upon the same Namidians; and not suffering them to re-all themselves drawe them quite out of the signue flowing that the same flowing that they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well prouided. Diners of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned : but ranne backe vponthe right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they difordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing : against whom they gaue to Lelius the same advantage, that Masaniss had against the Numidians; which he vied in like fort. In the meane while, the Battels of foote advanced, and drew neere together with a flow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast : at what time they gaue a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercinaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quickneffe, to haue the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following fomewhat neere after the Haftati, encouraged their fellowes; and shewed themselves readie, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercinaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the newleuied Carthaginians and Africans, when they faw their hire! fouldiours give backe. did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gaules, and the rest, to thinke 20 themselves betraied: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way vnto the Mercinaries for their fafe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the enemies, that purfued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chaced by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and flaine, through their owne indifferction, by their owne Mercinaries. The Roman Haflati in like fort, fighting with desperate menin a throng, had their hands fo full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp 20 vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the cares among themselves. In this place was made a great flaughter, both of the Mercinaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor eafily flie. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or faue these Runne awaies. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would have rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne afide beyond his Battaile, and faue themselues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was covered with fuch thicke heapes ofdead bodies and weapons, and so slippery with bloud: that Scipio began to stand 40 in great doubt, less the orders of his Battalions should be dissoluted in passing that way. In such case, if hee should fight with that warlike Armie, which he saw before him, remayning yet entire, and without feare expecting him ; He might be well affured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hallati to make a fland there where they were, opposite vnto the maine battaile of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarij : He placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Haftati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertayned him after another manner, than euer he had beene received in his life befor e. All the daies worke till now, feemed to have beene onely a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe 50 Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable souldiours. The Romans were encouraged, by their having prevailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old souldiours of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chose to die voon the ground, whereon he stood. So that, af-

after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse; vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; foras funch as the returne of Mijanissa and Lalius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse; is said to have beene most happic and in a needful time. These you the sudden charged the Hannibolium in Rere, and ouer-bearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaile there dyed of the Romani. fifteene hundred and vpwards: on the Carlbagnian fide, about eventie thoufand, befides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopatre Captaine of the Chactediniani, was one. The fingular skill than Hamiliah hewed in this his laft fight, is highly commended by Polyhims; and was acknowledged, as Limiereports by Seepin himselfe. But the Enemies were too firong to for him in Horfe: and being enioyned, as hee was, by the flate of Carlbage to take battaile with fuch difaduantage, faccould worke no maruels. He faued himself with a few Horfe; and Raid not in his journie, till he came to Advantam. Thence was he fent for to Carlbage; from which he had beeneabfent fixe and thirtie yeares. At his comming into the Senate He faid plainly. That there was none other way left, than to take fuch peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carlbagnians, not knowing what other courfe to take, refolue to fend Emballadours againe, and trie the fauour of $cipin, whole armes they could not now refilt.

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrific the Citie, than with any hope to takeit. His Legions he committed vnto Cn. Octanius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then fending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victorie, He fet faile from Vica towards Carthage. Hee was encountred on the way by ten Embaffadours from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vie the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would give them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attemptit; He returned backe to Ptica, and called backe Octavius thither, with whom in person Heeset forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journie thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were alreadic vanquished. This Vermina feemes to have beene both careleffe of getting intelligence how things paffed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that hee hardly escaped himselse with a few; leaving fifteene thou fand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. If this good companie had beene with Hannibal at Nada- 40 gara, they should hauebeene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian loft, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, thoughit were no great accesse vnto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtie Embassadours from Carthage: whose behaviour though it was more pitifull than it had beene before; yet procured it leffe commiferation, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like fort humbled themselues. Neuerthelesseit was confidered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to beliege the mightic Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, less the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands; and giuen to 50 one of the Confuls. Cn. Sernilius Capio, that Conful who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicil(as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africke, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restraine the ambition of this Conful Sernilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made fuit for the same Prouince of Africk and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his defire; yet he needes would be going, procuring onely leave of the Senate, that he being Conful might joyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hee could have his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the journie, wherein no man cared to turther him: Winter came on, and he was only toft at Sea with foule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Confullhip expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victoric obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Conful to pattionate, in defiring Africk for his Province, That he faid he would fuffer nothing to paffe in the Senate, vntill he had first his wil. Much adoc there was about this : and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Conful at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answere vnto the Carthaginian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had deferued and in regard thereof to thinke themselves weldealt withall, in that he was contented to leave vnto them their libertie and their own Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection: leaning also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this warre. As touching the reft hee was at a point, That, before he cyther granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whillt the late Treatic was in dependence. Hereunto if they would yeild; then required He That immediatly they should deliner up unto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugla tines, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewife all their Gallies, excepting tenne: and all their Elephants: That they (hould make no warre at all thenceforth out of Africk, neither yest within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Townes. no goods what socuer, belonging any wife onto MASANI'S SA or to any of his Ancesters, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored onto him; That they should find corne for the Roman Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries . during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded : That they should paytenne thou and Talents of Silver, in the terme of fiftie yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages, fuch as Scieno would choose, being none of them under foureteene yeares of age, nor a-

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home; and reported them viito the Citie. They were verie unpleasing; and therefore one Gi/co stood up to speake against them; and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they should not condificend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withall what favourable audience was given to this uaine Oratour, by the vinquiet yet vinwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his franding, by plaine force. Hereat all the people murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by fuch infolence of this prefumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, role vp and spake vnto them : saying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citic would allow; forasmuch as he had been thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man of fine and fortic. Haning thus excused himselfe of the disor-50 der, He discoursed unto them concerning the Peace : and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemie beene yet more rigorous. Finally vpon good aduice, they refolued to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand fine and twentie thousand pound weight of Siluer, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them Cccccc 3 done to his Fleet and Embaffadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths: in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Heegaue injunction, that they should neyther in the meane while fend Embaffadours any whither elfe, nor yet difmiffe any Embaffadours to them fent; without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their crrand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wife and honourable men, by the miferies wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counfailes. A/drubal, furnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno. was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They 10 went thither in companie of Scipio his Embassadours; who related vnto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon; who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to wait awhile for audience, till the election of new Confuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately fignified viito their King that they found themselues grieued; returned the blame upon those Greekes themselues, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Amelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately beene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, 20 tarried in Greece behind his fellowes; and there lenying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they defired of the Senate, That one S-pater, a Micedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrimen, that had lately ferued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africk were kept in bonds by Scipio; might bee released, and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furiw, whom Aurelius had fent to Rome for that purpole, made a sharpe answere. He said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured to many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as hee might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater : He affirmed him to be one 20 of the Kings Counfaile, and verie inward with him; one that ferued not for monie, but carried monie with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the aide of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answere; they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre hee sought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as he had begunne. For in two maine pointes He had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romans : first , in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had aided their Enemies against them with men

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Ea- 40 sterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a verie reuerend companie, when they entred into the Senate: and Asarubil aboue the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessitie of sending Embassadours to Carthage, whon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrell had beene wholly on the Romans lide, faying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could bee not altogether excuse the Citie; that had been too vehement in the profecution of bad counfaile. But if Hanno and himfelfe might have had their wils: the Carthaginians, even at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace which they now defired. Herewithall hee commended the 50 moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaics they had beene victorious. To the same offect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diversitie of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Persurie, as they themselves might have laid vponthe Rom ins; if their diligence and fortune had beene fuch as the Romans was. Among the reit, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would fweare to keep the peace hereafter : Afdrubab made answere; Euen by the Jame gods, that are fo feuere unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conful interpoling the authoritie of his Office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to loofe the honour, which he purposed to get by making warre in Africke But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom refted the Soueraigne Comno mand of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates fent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best : which were none other, than the same which hee had alreadie propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Schate; and craued licence, that they might visite their Countrimen, which were prisoners in Rome : afterwardes , that they might ransome and carrie home with them some, that were their especiall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would choose, should 10 be sent ouer into Africk, and be freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leave, and returned home, in companie of the tenne Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyne with Scipio in Com-

At their comming into Africke, the Peace was given, and accepted, without anie controuerlie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were delipered up to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitues; and vpon those of the Romans, than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines hee beheaded: the Ro. mans he crucified. About the first payment of their monie, the Carthaginians were 30 somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could have spared two hundred I alents for the present : yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftic yeares; it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collecting of the fummethere was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman voke had begun to pinch them; fo as many, euen of the Senatours, could not forbeare weeping. Contrariwife Hannibal could not refraine from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afdrubal Hadus and tolde, That it worst of all befeemed him to laugh, fince he had beene the cause why all others did weepe; Hee answered, That laughter did not alwaies proceed from ioy, but sometime from extremitie of indignation. Yet faid Hec, My laughter is more feafonable, and leffe abfurd, than your teares. For 40 yee should have wept, when yee gave up your Shippes and Elephants, and when yee bound your owne hands from the vie of Armes ; without the good leave of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keepes vs under; and holds vs in affured seruitude. But of these matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little monie is wrung out of your private purles, ye have thereof some fense, God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein yee hall acknowledge, That it was the very least part of your miserie, for which ye have shed thefe teares. Thus discoursed Hannibal vnto those, who talking the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counfaile, repented when it was too late; and in flead of curfing their owne disorders, which had bred this grieuous discase, accused that Physicion, whose noble endeauours had beene employed in procuring the remedie.

30 Scipio being to take leave of Africke, produced Mefaniffa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not undeservedly. To him also he configned ouer those Townes of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held : wherein, to fay truth hee gave him but his due ; and that which otherwife he knew not well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, and friendship of

Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hecreafter, to all the descruings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there refted no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themselves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lilybaum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and fent the reft before him thither by Sea. His journy through Italie was no leffe glorious than any Triumph : all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the city in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with fogreat ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time fhortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the 10 Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison : or whether he were dead awhile before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be anowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Remans, to insult ouer the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous war. But hereof wee shall have better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contempla-Exemple Poly. tion of that grievous warre past, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope, that ever they should set Italie free. This made them looke cheerefully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more ioy, than they well 20 could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African : ftiling him by the name of that Prouince which he had subdued. This honourable kind of furname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert : especially by many of the Casars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if fuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

the great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath beene affigned as a probable cause. For fince Nature is confined vnto a subice that is not unbounded; the workes of Nature must needes be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependence vpon the wil of man, 50 we are leffe to wonder, if we find leffe variety: fince it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious vnto human: power; and fince they are the fame affections, by which the wils of fundry men are o-

per-ruled, in mannaging the affaires of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldsans inuaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thousand foote and threescore thousand horse; but fayling in their intended conquest, they became Subject within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with fuch numbers of men, as might haue seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leasure from intestine war deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. It Nabuchodonofor with his rough old fouldiours, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, have beene farre different. Yet would it then have beene expedient for them, to employ the travelland vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though leffe renowned, than their owne . For the menacing words vsed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may bee, that Nabuchodonofor likewise offended the Medesand Persians ) were not so availeableto victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Affe. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-vinderstanding the language of Fame: and despiling the vertue that makes little noise, aduenture to prouoke it against themselues; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foyled by any of leffe-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Euilmerodach, had flumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dalht his foot, Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better souls diour than any other Greekilh King, when he entred into war against the Romans. This war he vindertooke as it were for his mindes fake : having received no injurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that ferued under him, to preuaile so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serue as a Rep to his further intended conquelts, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrehus, had found their owne vertue to be of richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and what soeuer else had served to make him terrible) serve onely to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselues. * For fince they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himfelfe Lord of Greece and Mace- Spaines predon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vinwarlike Provinces, tended inuinwhich in compasse of twelve yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had won? being beaten Certainly there was hereunto requilite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion, by some good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, all seas, inuiwould follow of it felfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had of Spaine; and fliewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more achauing broken quaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soone after the the Spaniards wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leifure to hear- gathered tokenafter newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion; that should be on neuer made that fide presented. They had also then a strong Fleet : and were become though account of any not other wife very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Testa made at the same time cruellwar vpon the Greekes: wasting their Country, and facking their Townes, onely because they were vnable to relift, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queene was not flow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with 5.7.

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be defired by the Greekes. But no fuch thing happened: though they fent Embaffadours, as it were to offer themselues; by signifying, that for the loue of Greece they had vndertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards increased very haltily, through the indifcretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose busines with them being now the subject of our flory, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a busic time in the world, when, within the space of foure yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and three 10 of them yong boyes, in three of the greatest kingdomes. This happened from the third yeere of the hundred thirtie ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Selencus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopater succeeded in the Kingdome of Ægypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the fonne of Demetrius, being lixteene or seventeene yeeres old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaans and most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. Aboutthe same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia, 20 Lycurgus found meanes to make himfelf King ouer the Lacedemonians, whole Common-weale, fince the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the state of a mighty King . Lastly, in the second and third yeeres of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open warre brake out betweene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invalion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed vnto an end : Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the reft, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Pelaponne/us; greatly de-30 stredof the Achaems, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an casie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no leffe obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have beene to the Spartan; and therewith all it lay open vnto the violence of the Ætolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons therof. These Atolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Pelaponnefus. Their inualion was no leffe vnexpected, then it was vniuft; whereby with greater ease they made spoile of the Country; finding none prepared to make relistance. The Acheans were called by the Meffenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly ; because the Atolians, passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner ) done what harme they lifted. Old Aratus could ill abide these Atolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the iniuries, wherewith most vngratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that he could hardly endure to stay a few daies untill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Acheans for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselse a man fitter (as hath beene already no- 50 ted of him ) for any other service, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to paffe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrie, wherein he might easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recourred ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie.

So they departed homerich, and well animated to return eagaine. As for the Achieans; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Meffenians : with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Atolians inuaded Peloponne fus againe; having no more to doe, than to passe over the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulfe of Leganto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There ioyned with them in this their fecond Invalion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of letting out no ships of war vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke aduentures againe, and did great mischiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of Chap. 3.5.1. the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians : who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Ægean

CHAP.4. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

Sea: whence returning, he did fome good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could elfe-where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Etolians into Peloponnefus: who made greater hauocke in the Countrie now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any relistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were delirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that viged to have fome grieuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedamonians: who were thought under-hand to have favoured the Atolians, in meere despight of the Acheans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had beene so affected : and (which was worfe) at the arrivall of Philip, they flue fuch friends of his, as having checked their inclination, feemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they welcommit themselves to indecement; but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: fince their towne was lately much disquieted with civill discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant alwajes to remaine at his denotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that the (or rather old aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did miffe-vinderstand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to beinterrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Acheans, Baotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaying vpon the Azolians and defiring to have war decreed against them, by common affent. Philip fent his letters vnto the Ætolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have beene there at the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certainty, they adjourned the Councell vnto a further time : faving, That fuch weighty matters ought not to be handled, faue in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This tricke of Law not with standing open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had descrued it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these inualions made on Pelapannel w ; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must have laied the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publick

After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared bufily for the warreagainst the yeere following. He also affayed the Illyrian, Seer dilaidas, with faire words and promifes : whom he casily won from the Atolian side, for a much as the Atolians had cousened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like fort the scheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the war in their owne Country, fent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Mellenians, and Lacedemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, & to denounce war vnto the £tolians; without flaving (as it were) to await the cuent, Hereunto they received diuerfe answeres, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a tree-harted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Etolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; faid, that they could not honeftly refuse to shew their faithfull meaning in that war, which was concluded by generall affent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheleffe more cunning and referred : fo that they flood vpon a needlesse point ; and desired to be held excused, until Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaime the war. The Meffenians, for whose cause the warre was vndertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Atolians held upon their borders; and faid, that they durft not be ouer-bold, until that bridle to were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedemonians; the chiefe of them fludied onely how to mannage that treason, for which their City had beene so lately pardoned: and therefore difmiffed the Embaffadours of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeares together continued subject against their wils to the Macedonians, expecting fill when Cleomenes should returne out of &grpt to raigne ouer them againe 3 and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publicke satety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preferued them: And hereto they referred all their counsailes ; being perhaps not a little moued with respect of the 20 benefit, which might redound vnto themselues, byadhering firmely to those which at the present bore rule ouer them. Others, and those the greater part, were still deuifing, how to make all ready for Cleamenes against his returne; and therefore fought to joyne with the Ltolians, which were the most likely to give him strong affinitance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more passionate; and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it fuffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleamenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended : fancying vnto themfelues the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come again. 30 Cleamens was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and luftre; which once he had in a manner performed: But fince he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deferring vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpes, they must continue little better than fubiects vnto the Macedonian, and far leffe by him respected, than were the Acheans. Thus were they transported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Atolians to fend an Embaffic to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himselfe the Author. Much disputation 40 and hot there was, between those of the Macedonian partie and these their oppofites: in fuch wife that nothing could be concluded; vntill by maffacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Atolians, the discristic of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedemonisms and Etolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Acheans; who had spared the Citic, when they might have destroicd it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King; that we may juillie wonder, how they grew fo careleffe in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royali families they found Agespolis the sone of Agespolis the son of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his Grandfather. This Agesippolis was a yong boy, standing in neede of a Guardian ; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouernment. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how yong socuer, should have his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedamonians, though standing in neede of a man, were to punctuall in observation of the Law; that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vicle Cleamenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime; but made election of one Lyoungus, who having no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed upon each of the Ephoria Talent, and thereby made himselfe be falured King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lyeurgue, to gratifie his Partifans, and to approue his worth by Action; inuaded the Countrie of the Argines: which lay open and ungarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and wanne divers Townes; wherof two hee retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedamon. After such open hostilitie, the Lacedamonians declared themselves on the Atolian side; and proclaimed warre against the A-

and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not readic; the Epirots gaue vncertaine answere; the Messenians would not stirre; all the burden must lie voon themselues and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Atolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could inuade at pleasure, as they were like to doe and on by helpe of the Lacedemonians, could affaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Etolians, palling over the Bay of Corinth, furprised the Towne of Agira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grieuously have molested the Ashems: for that it frood in the mid-way betweene Leium and Sieven two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrie. But as Egira was taken by furprise : so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile, whilest they that should have made it their first care to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of strength, fel heedleffely to runfack private houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head. by whom they were driven with great flaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About no the same time, another Atolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Welterne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territoric of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achean Confederacie. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so wel beaten that the enemiegrew bolder with them than before. They fent for helpe vnto their Pretor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Acheans having lately beene much weakened by Cleamenes, were now able to doe little of themfelius: neither could they get any itrength of Mercinaries; for a fruch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had couctoufly with-held part of their due from those that serned them therein. So through this disabilitie of the Acheans, and insufficiencie of their Pretor, the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike feruice, and to convert the monie to their own defence. Learness also with his Lacedemonians, began to winne upon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the Atolians, whilf their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponne (us. The Epirots joyned all their forces with him: and by fuch their willing readines, drew him to the feige of a Frontier pecce, which they defired to get into their own hands; for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped thortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent fortiedayes, ere he could end the busines, which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the so hart of Ætolia at his first coming it was thought that he might have made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not feldome, that the importunitie of Affociates, to have their own defires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those vies for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindering the profecution of their maine de flignes.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrously embolden the Atolians: in such fort, as their Prætor Scopes adventured to lead all their forces out of the Countrie; and therewith not onely to ouer runne Theffalie, but to make impression into Macedon. Hee ranne as farre as to Dum, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Agean 10 Sea: which, being for faken by the Inhabitants at his comming, Hee tooke, and razed to the ground. Hee spared neyther Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouer urned all: and among the reft, he threw downe the Statua's that were there erected, of the Micedonian Kings. For this he was highly hononred by his Countrimen at his returne; for a fmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnelus, but euen to Macedon it felfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrie, for their paines taken at Duam. Philip having difpatched his worke at Ambracus, made a throng invalion vpon Etolia. Hee tooke Phoetie, Metropolis, Geniade, Peanism, Eleus, and divers other Townes and Castles 20 of theirs: of which hee burnt some, and fortified others. Hee also beat the . #10lians in fundrie skirms flees; and wasted all the Countrie ouer, without receiving any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrie of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently follicited by the Achean Embaffadours : newes came out of Micedon. that the Dardanians were readie with a great Armie to fal vpon the Countrie. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hamus from the Northerne part of Macedon; and were accustomed to seeke bootie in that wealthic Kingdome, when they found their owne times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journie into Peloponne/us; they purposed in his absence, which they 20 thought would be long, to get what they could for them felues in his Countrie; as had beene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to difmiffe the Achean Embaffadours, (whom hee should have accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them have patience untill another yeare. So Hee tooke his way home : and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chaced out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson, in the warres of Cleomenes : and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readic, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like confiderations, made him welcome vnto the Maccelonian King: whole 49 Counsailor he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake up their Armie; and gaue oner for the present their invasion of Macedon, towardes which they were alreadie on their way.

All that Sommer following the King rested at Lavissa in Thessalie, whilest his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Atolians rested not. They arenged themfelues upon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in A:olis, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Wintergrewon, and all thought of warre vntill another yeare was laid afide: Philip fole a journie into Peloponnejus, with flue thou fand Foot, and about four hundred Horfe. As foone as hee was 50 within Cerinilis, He commanded the Gates to be that, that no word might be carried forth of his arrivall. He fent privily for old Accusto come thither ynto him; with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achean Souldiors readie to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with fomewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meete with fuch opposition. Indeed they had little cause to seare: since the Acheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; untill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Etolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised, and all made prisoners, or flaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first comming, Philip got verie much reputation : as likewise hee purchased both reputation and loue, by diversactions immediatly following. He wanne P/ophis, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Atolians then held. Hee wanne it by affault at his first comming : wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemie, not belocuing that he would undertake fuch a peece of worke at such an unseasonable time of the yeare, was carelesse of prouiding even fuch flore of weapons, as might have ferued to defend it. The Towne was preferued by the King from fack, and given to the Acheans, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for verie feare; hearing how calily he had taken Plophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Acheans. The like liberalitie he yied towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to hufbandrie, and lived abroad in Villages; even fuch as were of the wealthier fort among them. So hee came to the <sup>20</sup> Citie of Olympia: where having done facrifice to Jupiter, feafted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes, Hee proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to there with the Atolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-deseruing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattaile hee tooke, with great numbers of flaues, and much wealth of all forts; such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-pcople were fled. Some of these were taken at the first affault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his journie, by sending Embassadours to yeeld beforchee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to fet themselues at libertie, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Ætolian Gaptaines; because they distrusted their abilitie to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpnesse of Winter would suffer him to flay there dayes. Faine he would have fought with the Etolians, but they made such hast from him, that he could not our take them, vntill they had couered themselues within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to have beene safe. But Philip affaulted them therein fo forcibly, that hee made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their lines and armes. Hauing performed so much in this Expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrivall in Peloponnefus, the Lacedemonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Areadia; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer their owne heads, they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselues home. This Lyeurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with monie: fo was hee neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall bloud, that thinking himselfe to have best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselse, by 50 propounding vnto the Muititude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equali distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient inflitution of that Commonwealth. He wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Ly-Dddddd 2

curg to his house: who perceining the danger, stole away and sled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their mindes being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilft he was vling his best perswations, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So hee lived afterwards among the Acheans a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lyeurgus, he returned home : and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to drine out his fellow. King yong forth all thole of Hercases in stace, journal means to the doings grew to be fulpected, Agespoolis, whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be supposed by the Februs Burt hough 19 in such fort as once he should have beene apprehended by the Ephori, But though his actions hitherto might have beene defended; yet rather than to aduenture himfelfe into judgement, he chose to flie for a time, and sojourne among his friendes the Ætolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him fuch good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe; not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tvrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not bee in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they lifted. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that hee chaced Agestipolis out of the Ci-20 tie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three verie justly deserved. What soeuer hee was towards some private Citizens: in the war against Philip, He behaved himselfe as a provident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

ò. I I.

How PHILIP was misseaduised by ill Counsailors: Who afterwards wrought treason against him, and were instly punished. He inuadeth the Atolians a second time: And forceth them to sue for peace: Which is granted vnto them.

Hilest the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following; fome ambitious men that were about him, fludied fo diligently their own greatnesse, as they were like to have spoiled all that he tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left vnto Philip luch Counsailors, as to him did feeme the fittest men for gouerning of his youth. 40

The cheife of these was Apelles; that had the charge of of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Polititian, thought that he should do a notable peece of service to his Prince; it he could reduce the Achams vnto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to passe; during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Acheans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastice some of that Nation; cauling his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refraine) to helpe their fellowes; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to 50 passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vniust that pleased the King. But these Acheans were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereof if they could have been contented to fuffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleamenes: They bemoned themseliues vnto old Aratus; and befought him to thinke vpon fome good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt carnestly with the King 3 as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King be stowed gracious words upon those that had beene wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he diffembled his choller for atime. He thought fo well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable service, in buinesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head, since, in biting at the taile, the fifth had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Acheans there were fome, who bore no heartie affection to Aratus. These he enquired out : and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court; promiting to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Arstan, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Acheans, and, as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians, bee quickly brought to conforme themselves, vnto the dutie of obedient Subjects. By fuch perswasions, He drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Acheans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have beene needfull in a bufineffe of more importance; the King, by faire words and threatnings together, obtained fo much, That Egeratus, a verie insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Fauorites, was chosen Prator, instead of one more worthin for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a verie strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yeilded it up for feare, at his first comming : whereof hee was glad; for that hee had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymeans, as hee pre-20 fently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he hard of no messingers from the Eleans, to fue for peace. For at his departure out of their Gountrie the last Winter. hee had let loofe one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vindertooke to make them forfake their alliance with the Atolians, and jovne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be cotented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein invalion; and that they should hold their libertic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tri-40 bute, or being kept under by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be defpiled, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrie: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before over-haftie to beleeve fuch faire promifes ) to fulpect Amphidumus as a Traitour, and one that was fet on worke for no other end, than to breed a mutuall diffidence between them and the Ltolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him Prisoner into Etelia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himfelfe; in better for Aratus, For the King (as was faid) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleuns, concerning the offers which he had made vnto them 50 by Amphilamus: Apelles, his Counfailor, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He faid that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such denices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them he faid it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Araii (the father and the fonne) had taken him aside and given him to vnderstand, that it would Dddddd 3 be verie prajudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the denotion of the Macedonian; And this was the true cause, why neyther Amphidamus was verie carefull in doing this meffage, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie; deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no fooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee fent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearfe it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did fo, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men alreadie conuicted. And when hee had faid all the rest, ere eyther Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King bath found you fuch vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Acheans; and therein having made it 10 knowne what yee are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your felues. Olde Aratusgrauely admonished the King; That whensoever hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth; He should for beare awhile to give credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and hee should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a veric abfurd thing, That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yes, and anothers no. Hercof the King liked well; and faid that he would make 20 fufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when hee found no better than a meere device against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could

The varefiful temper of Apelles, having with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous 30 for want of his free motion. Hee betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Aratis fo fayling of them he thinkes it wisedome to lay for the King himfelfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimnie, but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too firong to be caught and held by the fubtile workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the source that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and fuch as would not bee corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the 40 Targuetiers, and Megaleus chiefe of the Secretaries, were callly wonne to bee at Apelles his disposition. This Polititian therefore studied how to remoue the other two from their places, and put some Greatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumniation and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vsed more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King mighe ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such art he thought to have removed him, as wee fay, Out of Gods bleffing into a warme Sunne. In the meane feafon Aratus retired himfelfe; and fought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the 50 new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was loft, whilest Philip wanted both the monie and the Corne, wherewith he should have beene furnished by the Acheans. This made the King understand his owne errour; which he wisely fought to reforme betimes. Hee perfwaded the Ashams to rejourne their Parliament from Asimm, to Sixpm the Towne of Asiams. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: pertwading them to forget what was past; $\frac{1}{2}$ laying all the blame upon Apeles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of the sew orthic men, Hee casslic obtained what he would of the Ashams. Fiftie talents they gaue him out of hand, with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as he him selfe in per son followed the warters in Pelopamps, he should receive ten talents amoneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide shipping, that so he might inso under the Astoliams. Eleans, and Landelmoniams, that were maritime people, at his pleafure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It wased Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; seuen by the ministerie of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracie with Leantins and Megaless: binding himselfs and them by oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing they thought to bring it to passe, that verie want of abilities odoe any thing without them, should make him speake them faire; and be glad to submit himselfero their directions. The Kingit is like had stood in some awe of them whiles the was a child: and therefore these wise men pershaded them see the submit of the submit o have bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Atolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiefe would have fallen, as soone after it did, vpon themselues. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Acheans, with some part of his and their Mercinaries. Hee 20 himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephallenia: whence the Atolians, dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palea, that had beene very feruiceable to the Enemie against him and his Confederats; and might be very vie full to him, if hee could get it. Whilest hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene ships of war from Scerdilaidas; and many good fouldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts faue one, on which fide Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he onerthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leonteus Captaine of the Targettiers, was ap-40 pointed by the King to make the affault. But he, remembring his couenant with Apelles, did both will fully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many flaine; not of the worst fouldiers, but fuch as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angrie with this: but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the fiege. For it was caffer vnto the Townel-men to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed, and uncertaine what course to take : the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them delirous to draw him into their owne Countrie. The 50 Messenians alleadged, that Lyangus was busic in washing their Countrie : vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etelian windes which then blew, serving fitly for his Nauigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who confidered that those windes, as they would easily carrie him thither, so would they detaine him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-daies) and make him spend the Sommer to small purpose. But Aratis gaue better counsaile, and prevailed. Hee showed how unfitting it were, to let the Setolians over-run all The flaite againe, and fome part of Macedon, while it the King withdrew his Armie farre off to feeke Imall aduentures. Rather, he faid, that the time now ferued well to carry the war into Aetolia; fince the Prætor was gone thence abroad on rouing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lyeurgus; hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets faile for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to fee him on their borders; and joyned with him as many of them as 10 could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vp into the in-land Countrie: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to affure his Retrait; He passed on to Thermum; which was the Receptacle of the £tolians, and furest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, environed with rockie Mountains of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Atolians vieto hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their folemne games. There also they yield to beltow the most precious of their goods, asin a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them carelesse in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there 20 wasnothing elfe to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that he thought the paines of his journie well recompensed. So he loaded his Armie; and confuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging vnto the Ltolians; in remembrance of the like their courtelie, thewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Etolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleeved before; and therefore was not taken vnawares. Three thousand of them there were 30 that lying in ambush fell upon his skirts: but hee had laid a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrian; who flaying behind the reft, did fet vpon the backes of the Aetolians, whilest they were builty charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with flaughter of the enemie, he returned the fame way that he came : and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, Hee fafely carried all that hee had gotten abourd his Fleet. Once the Aetolians made countenance of fight, iffuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home fafter than they came, and followed to their verie gates.

The ion of this victorious Expedition being eueric way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any finisher accident; it pleased the King to 40 make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megalens. They came, because they could not choose: but their heavie lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It greeued them to thinke, that they should be able to giueno better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himfelfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. The forrow and indignation, which they could ill diffemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselves with drinke, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent : they fell to reuiling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as 50 happens in fuch cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had paffed. Which made him fend for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder; and they, to giue him froward anfwers: infomuch as they faid at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mifchhefe as he deferued. Hecreupon the King committed them to ward. Leonius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who is was that had darde to lay hands yon Maguicus, yea and to caft him into prion? Why, faid the King, It was cuen I. This refolute anfwer, which Leonius had not expected, made him depart both fad and angrie; feeing himfelfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after Maguleus was called forth to his anfwer, and was charged by Aratus with malon year from the Maguleus was called forth to his anfwer, and was charged by Aratus with malon year. In the many with malon year, and the Compact made with Apalles: matters no leffe touching Leonius, that food by as a looker on, than Maguleus that was accufed. In conclution, the prefumptions again thim were foftrong, and his anfwers thereto fo weake; than the, and Crisus one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crimon being remanded back to prifon; and Caontum becomming Bayle for Magaleus. This was done

vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corenth. Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedamenions. These and the Eleans had done what harmethey could in Peloponne fiss, whileft the King was an absent. The Acheans had opposed them as wel as they could; with ill successe: yet fo, as they hindered them from doing fuch harme as elfe they would have done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrie about Lacedamon : and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleeue that he was returned out of Ltolia. He tooke not in this expedition any Cities, but made great walt in the fields: and having beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, flaues, and other Countrie-Spoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embaffadors from the Rhodians & Chians: that requested him to fet Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Metolians. They had gracious audience : and he willed them to deale first with the Aetolians; who, if they would make the fame request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Metolians had fped ill that yeere neither faw they any likelie hopes for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had fent forth to wast The saile and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not during to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane leafon they had been greinoufly afflicted, as before is thewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrie. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weake Allies the Eleans and Lacedamonians, Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends fhould be able to hold out; fince they were not strong enough to keepe the feild, but had alreadic fuffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each, to feeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Etolians readilie entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King, dealt with him by interceffion of the fame Embassadours, to entreat his presence at a Diet of their Nation, that should bee held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchfafe to come, they promifed that hee fhould finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whileft these things were in hand 's Leonius and Megaless thought to have terrified the King, by railing seldition againt him in the Armic. But this device forted tonogood effect. The souldiours were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends; who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded by with so much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a nosse, and breaking open of dores; without surface harmedone. This was enough to informethe king (who easilie pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were verie falle. Yea the souldiours themselfues, repenting of their inscience, desired to have the Authors of the tumult foughtout, and punished according to their deferts. The King made shew as if hee had not cared to make fuch inquistion . But Leontins and Megaleus were lore afraid , left the matter would foone come out of it felie to their extreme danger. Wherefore they fent vnto Apelles, the Head and Archetect of their treason; requesting him speedilie to repaire to Corinth, where he might stand betweene them and the kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the busineffe, vndertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken vpon him. as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand : and thereby was he growne into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themfelues vnto him; and received from him their dispatch in everie busines. Likewise 10 the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnific the vertue of Apelles; making flight mention (onely for falhion fake ) of the king : who feemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in fetting him elfeout vnto the people: but in mannaging the kings affaires, he made it his especiall care, that monie, and all things needfull for the publicke service, should be wanting. You he enforced the king, for veric neede, to sell his owne Plate and houshold vessels: thinking to resolue these and all other difficulties, by onely faying, Sir, be ruled wholly by mee, and all first be as you would wish Hereto if the king would give affent; then had this Politician obtained his hearts defire. Now taking his journie from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubara, to 20 the Citie of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltic, by a great number of the Captaines and fouldiours; which Leontins and Megaleas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the Citie with a goodly traine; he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride; and had vehement suspition of his falshood. Wherfore one was fent to tell him, that he should waite awhile, or come another time; for the king was not now at leifure to be spoken with. It was a pretie thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants for fake him, as a man in difgrace; in fuch fort that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him fauc his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchfafed him now and then some slender graces; but in consultations, 30 or other matters of privacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megaless to looke vnto himselfe, and runne away betimes. Hercupon the King sent forth Taerion his Lieutenant of Peloponne/w, with all the Targettiers, as it were to doe some peece of feruice; but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to fignifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith fent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to triall before their returne : as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they faid that they were readie to make a purfe for his discharge. This affection of the souldiours, made Philip more hastic than else 40 he would have beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote vnto the Atolians; vilifying the king with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out awhile, for that Philip was cuen readie to linke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the king vnderstood more perfectly the fallhood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him to poore. Wherefore hee fent one to purfue Megalens, that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his fonne, and another that was inward with him, to prifon; wherein all of them (hortly ended their lines. Megaless alfo, neither daring to frand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was wearie of his 50 owne life; and flew himfelfe about the fame time.

The Etelians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonnage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratm, wrought verie effectually toward their overthrow.

ouerthrow; they grew verie delirous to make an end of it. Neuerthelesse being a turbulent Nation, and readie to lay hold vpon all advantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Magaleus, together with some indignation thereupon conceined by the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhum. Of this was Philip nothing forie. For being in good hope throughly to tame this virquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay a lide all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; wherin he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian fouldiors, by ycelding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontins in their Treatons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and fuffered death. Thele were the fame Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leonius his imprisonment : yet now they thinke the man worthie to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vie to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip wan some bordering Townes; from which 20 the Dardenians, Etolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accultomed to make rodes into his kingdome when hee had thus provided for fafetic of his owne, the Atolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Emballadours from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Agrpt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former follicitation about the Peace. This falhion had beene taken up in matters of Greece, cuer fince the Kings that raigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to fet the whole Countrie at liberrie: No fooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppreffed, and fubdued by force of war, but prefently there were found intercessours, who pittying the eftution of Greekish bloud, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advanto tage. By doing fuch friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde vnto them those people, that were, howsoeuer weake in numbers, ver verie good fouldiours. But hereby it came to paffe, that the more froward fort, especiallie the Æioleans, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robberie durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours : being well affored, that if they had the worst, The lone of Greece would be fufficient to redeeme their quiet. They had, fince the late Treatie of peac, done what harme they could in Peloponne [us: but being beaten by the scheans, and standing in feare to be more foundlie beaten at home, they defired now, more earnestlie than before to make an end of the warre as foone as they might. Philip made fuch answer to the 40 Embassadours, as he had done the former veere; T hat he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it; but that the Etolians, if they had a defire to live in reft, must first be dealt withall, to fignific plainly their determination, whereto himfelfe would returne fuch answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he dailie got by the warre. But it happened in the middeft of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Askeedan, what a notable victorie Hamilton had obtained against the Romans in the battaile at Thin affinement. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Phorius: who greatly so encouraged him to take part with Hamiltal: and not to sit fill, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby be grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the **Etolams: which was concluded flortly in a meeting at **Nanpādius**. There did **Agelaus an **Etolam** which was egreat Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing war between themfolius.

felues: without being molefled by the Barbarians. For when once either the Komans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it felfe; and that Philip, if he were defirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly feruing, to enlarge his dominion, by winning fomewhat in Italie. Such aduice could the Atolians then give, when they flood in feare of dan. ger threatning them at hand : but being soone after wearie of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselues by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their owne good counsel, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrie, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrie) under seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple,

And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canne. after which he ioyned in League with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Phe rius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vp. on them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, 30 that was in a manner wholly guided by his counfaile, to take part with their enemies. It had other wife been farre more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, have both fecured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of cheife place in his freindship. The issue of the counfaile which he followed, will appeare soone after this. CHAP.4. S.4. of the Historie of the World.

ò. IIII.

How PHILIP reelded to his natural vices, being therein loothed by DEMETRIVS PHARIVS, His desire to tyrannize wpon the free States his Affociates : With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whileft he bore a part in the fecond Punicke warre. He poisoneth ARATVS: and growes hatefull to the Achsens.

Itherto Philip had carried himfelfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wildome, he might have offered his freindship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand : yet this his medling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a defire to fecure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath beene said) by Dememetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himfelfe to his defires: and thereby thortly gouerned him, euen as he lifted. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudie, and tyrannicall: deirous of power to doe what he lifted, and not otherwife lifting to doe what hee ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire show he might breede in to men fuch a good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that ha e tooke in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good pollicie, to bring the Greekes that were his Affociates under a more abfolute forme of Subjection. Heercunto Apelles had aduited him before : and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if hee might not wholy have his owne way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours and guided, like a Coach man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himselse did onely seeme to tollow. Therefore hee grew daily more and o more in credit: fo as, without any manner of contention, hee Supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a verie hote Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forrein war) vnto domesticall objects : than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew fo violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: refoluing fo to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strine any more about their Gouernment : for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus but ie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne fecret pur pofe. Wherfore he consulted not with this reperend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to fland thus disputing : and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the infolence of the vnruly Rabble: Contrariwife, in talking with the heades of the popular Faction, He faid it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselues to be oppressed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselues from Tyrants. Thus whilelt each of them prefumed on the Kings affiftance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would have apprehended fome feditious Oratours, that were, they faid, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the People tooke Armes : and running upon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be easie to worrie the sheep, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his failhood and double dealing was immediatly found out. Neyther did the 10 yonger Aratus forbeare, to tell him of it in publick, with verie bitter and difgraceful words. The King was angrie at this. But having alreadiedone more than was commendable, or excusable; and yet further intending to take other thinges in hand wherein hee should need the helpe and countenance of his bell friends; Hee was content to fmother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. He led old Arates aside by the hand; and went up into the Catile of Ithome, that was ouer Aleffene. There he pretended to doe facrifice; and facrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength, and would ferue to command the further parts of Pelaponnefus, as the Citadell of Corinth, whith hee had alreadie, commaunded the entrance into that Countrie. 20 Whileft hee was therefore facrificing, and had the entrailes of the beaft deliucted into his hands, as was the manner; Hee thewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he faw therein did fignifie, That being now in possesfion of this place, hee should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have foothed him a little; were it onely for defire to make amends, for the angric words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus flood doubtfull whatto answere, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict : If thou bee a South syer, thou maift goe thy wayes, and let slippe this good aduantage, if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opertunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus 30 he fpake, refembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vito the two hornes of Pelaponnelis. Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Meffenians: But if, by feizing vpon Ithome, Hee must loose all the other Castels that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonia, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his fouldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yelded at the present : but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betweene Him and the Arati; whom hee thought more froward than befeemed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man defirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discourred his Tytannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in reforting to his house, He had beene dishonest with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leifure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his owne Countriman, and a temperate Prince, hee had brought the Macedonians into Pelotonnelus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponne [us into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him companie. In this journie He found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnhonest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and fo they purposed to continue. But He would needes have them foto remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will. Hee feized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid fiege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not feeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of fetling the countrie, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could never quench; vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whileft he was thus labouring to bind the hands that (hould have fought for him in Italie; M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Etolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before. in 60-3-5-13-10 place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof though Philip did the offices of agood Captaine: yet when leifure ferued, Hee made it apparant that hee was a vicious King. Hee had not quite left his former defire, of oppreffing the libertie of the Meffenisus ; but made another journie into their Countrie, with hope to deceine them, as before. They understood him better now ahan before; and therefore were not hastieto trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not ferue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, inuaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt upon Meffene hee lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his 20 Counsailor, and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angrie he wexed against those, that feemed not to fauour his injurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministerie of Taurion, his Leiutenant, he poyfoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, hee poyfoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these thinges would never have been knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselues were more fure, than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymmes, and Proceffions, to be celebrated cuerie yeare twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpofe; as was accustomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to bee to translated into the number of the Gods. Hereunto they are faid to have beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have beene true; fince the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and fingular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Acheans a margailous diflike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counfaile for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleiued:neither were they in case to subsist, without his help that had committed it. The Atolians were a most outragious people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans had madea League: whereof the Condtions were soone 40 disulged, especially that maine point, concerning the distison of the purchase which they should make; namely, That the Etolians should have the countrie and townes: but the Romans the spoile, and carrie away the people to sell for slaves. The Acheans, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make ftreight alliance with the Ltolians, as knowing their vacuill disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for fuch did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne ) to make hauock of the Countrie. The same consideration moved also the Lacedemonians, to stand off awhile. before they would declare themselves for the Liolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industric therefore of Philip, and the great care 50 which he feemed to take of the Acheans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them. especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himfelfe the Dymeans, by an inclimable benefit : recourring their Towne, after it had beene taken by the Romans and Atolians; and redceming their people wherefocuer they might bee found, that had beene carried away

Captine, and fold abroad for flaues. Thus might he have blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and given men to understand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other soule acts, whereof he was not ashamed; He tooke Polycratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ferue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of fuch faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time; for of that which happened in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make reof Philopoemen Generall of the Acheans: and MACHANIDAS. Tyrant of Lacedemon. Abattaile betweene them, wherein MACHANIDAS is flame.

T happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there flood vp Philogamen: 20 whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achaans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopa men: who being then a yong man, and having no command; did especiall service to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellasia against Cleomenes. Thence-forward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and feldome or neuer at peace betweene themselves; Hee bettered among them his knowledge, and practise in the Art of warre At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried him felte fo thrictly, trauailing with all the Cities of the Confede- 20 racie to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all peeces: as also he so diligently trained them up in all exercise of service, that hee made the Acheans verie throng in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no leffe care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be frong enough to defend it felfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the helpe of others. Hee persuaded the Acheans to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparrell, houlholdfluffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that coil vpon their Armes; wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiors; and futeable in behaulour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had ferued hi- 40 therto with little light Bucklers, and flender Darts, to cast afarre off: that were viefull in skirmilhing at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hastie Expeditions; whereto Aratus had beene most accustomed. But when they came to handie ftrokes, they were good for nothing: fo as they were wholly driven to relie vponthe courage of their Mercinaries. Philopamen altered this : causing them to arme themselues more weightily, to vie a larger kind of sheild, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order; and altered the forme of their embattailing : not making the Files fo deepe as had beene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the service of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which hee first was Prætor of the Acheans; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedamon caused him to make triall, how his fouldiers had p, ofited by his discipline. This Muchanidas was the succesfor vnto Lyourges; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a ftrong Armie of Mercinaries : and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to hold the Citie in obedience to himfelfe perforce. Wherefore it behould him not to take part with the Acheens, that were favourers of libertie; but to firengthen himfelfe by freindship of the Atolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no furthet notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedamon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argines, Acheans, and Macedonians; were in like fort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Atolian Faction. Verie vn wifely. For in feeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordinip of Peloponne fus; they hindred themselves thereby from recourring the Mastrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, to-10 gether with the regard of his owne fecuritie, and no fmall hope of good that would follow, fuffered not Machanides to be idle; but made him alwaies readie to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whileft they were enforced, by greater necessitie, to turne face another way. Thus had bee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts, or form other opposition made against him, had vsually made him taile of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Acheans; and thought his ownomen better fouldiours than were theirs.

Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea

Whilest Philip therefore was busied else-where, hee entred the Countrie of the

and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopoemen was readie to Pith. L. 11. entertaine him at Mantines; where was fought betweene them a great battaile. The: Tyrant had brought into the fielde vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To preuent this danger, Philopamen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; fo as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To fecond thefe, from the one and the other fide came in continuall supplie; till at length all the Mercinaries, both of the Acheans and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight : boing fo far advanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no 30 otherwife be differned which preffed forward, or which recoyled, than by rifing of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made unserviceable, by the interpolition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercinaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their advantage of number, but (as Poly-Polibibid. bius well observeth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein viually the hired fouldiers of T yrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which live oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) 40 to affure their owne feruitude: fo the Mercinaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his prosperitie, have good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that ferue vnder a free State, have no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellowes, will not take much paines to vpon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Acheans, being forced to give ground, so were viged to violently in their retrait by those of Machanidas, that shortly they betooke themselves to flight; and could not be staid by any perswasions of Philopamen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Meheans. This difafter had beene sufficient to take from Philopamen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him fland in neede of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more fubjects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seeke to take revenge

20 and perhaps to get the * Lordship of Peloponnessus, as having stronger freindes, * Exercise 2

restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace vnto those that fled : leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedamonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Atheans, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his raffineile had carried him out of fight; Philopamen advanced towards the Lacedamonians that flood before him. There lay betweene them athwart the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time: and therefore paffable (as it feemed ) without much difficultie, especially for Foot, The Lasedemonians aduentured ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Acheans; who had in a manner alreadie loft the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaile; and had no sooner the foremost of them reconcred the further banke, than they were floutly charged by the Achaens, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first rankes being broken, all the rest began to shrinke: so as Philopamen getting over the ditch, easily chaced them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to vie his advantage; than Machanidas had done. He fuffered not all his Armic to diffund and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the T yrant must come backe. The T yrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked verie heavily when he faw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustic Troupe of Horse about him Hee made, towardes the bridge: hoping to find the Acheans in diforder; and to fet vpon their backes, as they 20 were careleffely pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie faw Philopamen readic to make good the bridge against them; then beganne eneric one to looke, which way he might thift for himfelfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch fide; and fearched for an eafle paffage ouer. He was eafily discourred by his purple Gaslocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopamen therefore leaning the charge of the bridge vnto another, coafted him all the way as he rode; and falling upon him at length in the ditch it felfe, as he was getting ouer it. flew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaile on the Lacedemonians fide about foure thousand and more than foure thousand were taken Priloners. Of the Achean Mercinavies, probable it is that the loffe was 30 not greatly cared for; fince that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should have need.

PHILIP having peacewith Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagona, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

Y this victorie the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselves. Nevther needed they indeed after awhile (fuch was their discipline, and continual exercise) to account themselues in matter of warre inferiour to any, that should have brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, Hee made no great vie of them : But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Atolians, He Hudied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; fince the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or verie nearely together, and some of them not honest : wherein if the Acheans would have done to him feruice; they must, by helping him to oppresse others that neuer had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Atolians in warre against him.

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble man, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philet.crus his Vncle: who being guelded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child, grew after wards thereby to be the more effected; as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged viito wines or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Mafter, that betooke himfelfe to Lysimachus King of Thrace, Lysimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his monie and accompts. But when at length he flood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant : Hee fled into Afia, where he feized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The towne and monic, together with his owne feruice, He offered vnto Selenous the first, that then was readie to give Lysimachus battel. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus having flaine Lyfimschus, died fhortly after himfelfe, before he made vse of Philetarus or his monie. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is faid to have been a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps was not much better; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetarus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his advantage of the diffention, betweene Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the fonnes of the (cond Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes; and wan the victoric. At which time, to animate his men against the Gaules that served under his Enemie, he yield a pretic denice. He wrote the word*VICTORIE vpon the band of his Soothfayer, in *Int Front. fuch colours as would eafily come off: and when the hoteliner of the beaft that was Strat.L. 1. C. 11. facrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters. He published this vnto his Armic as a Miracle, plainely fore-thewing that the gods would be affiftant in that Battaile.

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemie to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to recour from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally when he had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a furfet of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalue, of whom wee now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, verie bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He reflored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was greinoufly molefted by Achein: who feeting vp himfelfe, as King against Antioches the great, reigned in the leffer Mia. He was belieged in his owne Citie of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tectofaga, a Nation of the Gaules, whom hee called our out of Thrace, He recovered all that he had loft. When these Gaules had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment : but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themfelues, without inuitation, and found themselues worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prastas King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzanium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they neverthelesse within awhile after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vied it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor fexe. But the swarme of them increating; they occupied the Region about Helleftont; where, in feating them felues. they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Nevertheleffe, prefuming afterwards so upon their firength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vinto Attalus than to any that had worse described of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them; and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time follow-

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritic of such, as had saued themfelues and their Proninces, in the flothful reigne of the Perfians, or in the butie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were vericancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, fister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrie was taken from them by Perdicers, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdice as crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at civill warres among themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it over to his of-fpring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian 19 Empire; and are faid to have iffued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Pylamenes, a King that affilted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselues vnto the times, were alwaies conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prustas had begun to reigne in Bithynia. some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therfore, having other employment, they were the leffe molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrie: where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Licutenant of Antigonus, that made them fomewhat more humble. And thus they fluffled, as did the reft, vntill the reigne of Prufice, whom wee have alreadic fome- 20

ð. VII.

The Towne of Cies taken by PHILIP, at the instance of PRVSIAS King of Bythynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, PHILIP growes hatefullto many of the Greekes: and is warred upon by ATTALVS King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

R v s 1 A s as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whole. greatneffe he suspected. He therefore strengthned himselfe, by taking to wise the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie side, entred into a strict Consederacie with the Etolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian warre, and was deuifing with Antiochus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his fonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and beflow it vpon him. Prusas had no right vnto the Towne, nor just matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly feated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadours came to him whilest heelay at the feige, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: entreating him to for fake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condificend to their request, when he intended nothing lesse. At length hee got the Towne: where, even in presence of the Embassadours, of whose sollicitation he had semmed so regardfull, He omitted no part of crueltie. Hereby hee rendred himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his Fact was detested of the Rhodians. who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani; and were aduertifed by Embassadours of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howfocuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as foone as he listed: yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to giue it ouer. And by this his clemencie the Embaffadours faid, that he would manifest vnto the World, what slanderous tongues they were; which noysed abroad fuch reports, as went of his fallhood and oppressions. Whilest the Embassadours were declaiming at Rhodes in the T heater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned : shewing that Philip had facked and destroyed the Towne of Cios, and, after a cruell flaughter of the Inhabitants, had made flaves of all that escaped the Sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despight, no leffe werethe Atolians inflamed against him : since they had lent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moued, with confideration of the Micedonians violent ambition, and of his owne estate. He had much to loofe; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had alreadie, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberalitie the loue of the Athenians, which were notable Trumpetters of other mens vertue, having loft their owne. On the freindship of the Atolians he had cause to presume; having bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held verie good intelligence with the Layptims, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, Hee calify drew into a fireight Alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceined against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all in the readic assistance of the Rhodians , Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had beene vnfeafonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemie tended; fince his defire to fasten upon Asa was manifest, and his fallhood no leffe manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Scarwherein though Attalus was driven to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound : and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the shore : Yet for a much as He had fuffered farre greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemie : and since Hee durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victoric was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwardes belieged and wanne some Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to despight his opposites; or whether your any hopefull defire of conquest; it is uncertaine. The stratageme, by which hee wonne Prinassus, is worthic of noting. Hee attempted it by a Myne : and finding the Earth fo stonie, that it relisted his worke, Hee neverthelesse commaunded the Pyoners to make a noyfe vnder ground; and fecretly in the night-time. Hee rayfed great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the befeiged. that the work went merualloufly forward. At length he fent word to the Townermen that by his vnder-myning, two acres of their wall flood onely your woodden props : to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercie. The Prinafians little thought, that hee had fetcht all his earth and rubbifh by night a great way off, to raife up those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be outfaced; and gaue up the Towne as lost, which the Enemie had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stale to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rho. dians were too ftrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haft back into Matedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of purfuit.

Hele Asiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet fer. ued well to make a noyfe in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, it not with a defire of making warre in Mucedon, at least with a conceipt that it were expedient fo to doc. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betweene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continual dealings in Greece cuer fince the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturals : yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because Hee was original- 20 ly for footh a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had beene most beholding vnto him, were neuerthelesse wearie of him, by reafon of his personal faults. All this gave hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially since the divisions of the Countrie were fuch, that eueric pettie Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generalitie. But the poore Commonaltic of Rome, had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were alreadie quite exhausted, by that grieuous warre with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loane to the Republike all their monie:neyther had they as yet received, neyther did they receive vntill fifteene or fixteene yeares after this, their whole fumme backe againe. That part of paiment also which was alreadie made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land : it behoued them to rest awhile; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the leffe able to beflow colt. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had fent Embassadours to follicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had fent letters of the fame tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by fetting out the preparations of this dangerousenemie, that follicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant thortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no fuch intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be relitted by Attalus and the Rhodisms, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne proteffed enemies. But fuch things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermedling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than himselfe. Hee was too vnskilfull, or otherwife too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needes bee feeking new enemics. And he found them fuch, as he deferued to have them: for hee 50 offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and haddone; him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the vtmolt in making warre vpon them; or, in defilting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, having broken that League of peace which is of all other the most natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlcffe they think them felues iultly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that he might wel be secure of the Romans, because of the written Couchants of peace between him & them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby fuch articles of peace can bee held inuiolable, faue onely by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it bindes one partie, or both visto performance, making it apparent that hee shall be a loofer who starts desaparent from the Conditions; it may follong (and follong onely) bee prefumed, that there thall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquilhed, the Romans neuer hearkned after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace o with Carthage, then was this River of Styx dried vp: and then could they fweare, 15 * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne felues, euen by their good fwords, * Flant, Arts that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopater into 16ar. Africke, and the present warre against Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed; or if this were not enough, the Albenians helped to furnish them with

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Territorie, tooke flate vpon them nevertheleffe, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous supero flition, vainly faid to bee auaileable vnto felicitie after this life) discouered themfelnes by fome impertinent queflions, to be none of those that were initiated. Herevpon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meere errour, not thinking to have therein done amiffe; yet, as it had beene for fome hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrimen at home tooke this in ill part; and fought to reuenge it as a publike injurie, by warre upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip fome Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence away with them a great bootic. This indignitie ftirred vp the high-minded Athemians; and made them thinke upon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe. 20 All which at the prefent they could doe, was to fend Embassadours to King Attalus: gratulating his happie succeife against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because He vnderstood, that the Roman Embaffadours, houseing about Grees for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the fame time. So he went thither, accompanied, befides his own followers, with fome of the Rhodians. Landing in the Pirans, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference : they rejoycing that he continued enemie to Philips and He being no left glad, when hee heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came forth of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as folemne a pompe as they could deuile, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in verie louing manner: but towards Attalns himselfe they omitted no point of obferuance, which their flatterie could fuggeft. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Affembly: where they defired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe; saying. That with an cuill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which he fludied to make them knowwhat loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have to bee propounded. Hee did fo. The points of his Declaration were; first, what hee had willingly done for their fake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation o vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest Hee with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and readic to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, He protested, that afterwardes it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as He to defire it. As for other matters; they loaded him with immoderate honours, Ffffff and ordained, That vito the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens confified, thould be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Arbens.

Thus beganne a great noyle of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romani for their part; Attahus and the Rhodians taking all you them. But while their were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Arbiansto their partie: the contraire to their olde manner were glad to bee at quite: Philip wanne the Townes of Marones and Arms, with many other strong places about the Heldesport, Likewise passing our the Heldesport, Hee laid siege vnto Abydus; and wanne to it, though Hee was faine to state there long. The Townes held out, rather you an oblimate resolution, and hope of sinceour from Attasia and the Rhodians, than any great abilitie to defend it selfe against so might be a Enemie. But the Rhodians sent thick could be a supported by the Rhodians for thicker onely one Quadrienne Gallie: and Attasus no more than three hundred men; sarre to weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassiandours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much you them.

Thele Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Emplius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vinco Piolomic. Epiphones King of Egypt, to acquain him with their Victoric against Hannubal and the Carthagainins; as also to thanke him for his fa-10 uour vinto them shewed in that warre; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should be supported by the state of the properties of the state of the photological points and done before him). Hee beganne a verie young boy. The courteste for which the state were to thanke him, was, That out of Egypt they had lately been supposed with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miseries of Warre had made all their owner Provinces viable to relieve them. This message could not but be welcome to the Egyptims : sline it was well knowne, how Philip and 5m. tiseshu had combined themselues against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason bee hoped, that Hice, or 30 his Councell for him, should offer to supplie the Remons with Corne: lince this their Macedonian Expedition, concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leifure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Anylius the youngest of them should steppe aside, and visit Philip, to trie if Hee could make him leaue the feige of Abydus; which elfe Hee was like to carrie. Amylius, comming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom Hee 40 made Warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the Towne of Abydus, which Hee was now befeiging, had a kind of dependancie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made Warre vpon him: and that Hee did onely requite them with the like. Do you also (fayd Eng. lius) requite these poore A MY DENI with such terrible Warre, for any the like Inuation by them first made upon you? The King was angrie to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answere to Amyline; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (about all, ) your being a Roman, that makes you thus prasumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that yee have made with me, and to keepe it : if yee doe otherwise, I will make yee under- 19 stand, that the Kingdome and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Towne immediatly yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died euerie one of them and fet their Towne on fire; binding themselues hereto

by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reafonable Conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, loft the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouernours and Ancients of the Citie, to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which while they were busie, the memorie of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger fort; that, by exhortation of their Pricis, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselues. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He faid, he would grant the Adjudent intree dayes less the concentration of the American such as the contraction of the Membership of the Compassion, the the sold is men to enter the Towne, nor thazed themselues in interrupting the violence of those mad soles.

The Romans decree warre against Pullup, and send one of their Consult into Greece, us it were in desence of the Athenians their Consederates. How pore the Athenians were at this time, both in qualitic and estate.

His calamitic of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Squatines: which indeed it nearely refembled; though Rome was not alike intereffed in the quarrell. But to helpe themselues with pre-tence for the warre, they had found out another Seguntum, cuen the Citie of Albens: which if the Macedonium should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that he should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five monethes, but in the fhort space of fine dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Conful tolde the Multitude. when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyribus was by him alleadged; to show, what 20 Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africk, to thew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrie. By such arguments was the Commonaltie of Rome induced to beleive, that this watre with the Macedonian was both just and necessarie. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Conful hafted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readineffe, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thankes were given to the Albernian Embassadours, for their constancie (as was faid) in not changing their faith at fuch time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thankes were to due to them; though not vpon the fame occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne partes; had reason to give thankes vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue. fuggestion. That Philip was making readic for Italie: and since neyther Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, defired the Romans to give them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and confequently with Philip, about a matter of May.game, (as was flewed before) fent Embaffadours into all parts of the World, even to Ptolemie of Agypt, and to the 50 Romans, as wel as to Attalus and other their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authours of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless at loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence; the doings of P. Sulpinius the Conful were such, as might have argued Athens to bee the least part of his care. Hee failed not about Pelopomefus, but tooke the reading Seffer 2

way to Macedon; and landing about the River of Apfus, between Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embaffadours were with him, and craued his helpe; whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was so farre from them. They bemoaned themselues as men belieged, and entreated him to deliuer them. For which cause He sent vnto them C. Clausius with twentie Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces He retained with him, for the profequation of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed belieged: onely fome Rouers from Chaleis, in the Ile of Eubara; and fome bands of aduenturers out of Corinth; vsed to take their shippes and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of 10 these two Townes. The Robberies done by these Pyrats and free booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Seige. From fuch detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, eafily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves; they that had beene wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the Conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Sieil; to make warre upon the great Persian King; and to hold so much of Greece in Subjection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest: had now no more than three Shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long Boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men; but stood as highly vpon the glorie and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had beene still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Eubwa, taken and fackt by the Romans and their Affociates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. PHILIP attempteth to take Athens by Surprise: wasleth the Countrie about: and makes a journie into Peloponne fus. Of NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedamon, and his wife. PHILIP offers to make warre against NABIS for the Acheans. He returneth home through Attica, which he foileth againe: and provides against his Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans, Diners Princes iorne with them. Great labouring to draw the Atolians into the warre.

HILIP, returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Conful his being about Apollonia. But ere he flirred forth to giue him entertainment; or perhaps before hee had well refolved, whether it were best awhile to fit still, and trie wher mishs heed and the state of the stat ning of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: Hee received advertisement from Chaleis of a grieuous 40 milhap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad; purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne employment better. Hee grew foone wearie of fitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to faue the Athenians grounds from spoile; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a bufineffe of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, for that there was no enemie at hand, and more negligently by the Townsmen, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, failed thither by night for feare of being descried; and, arriving there a little before breake of day, tooke it 50 by Scalado. He vsed no mercie, but flew all that came in his way and wanting men to keepe it (vnlesse hee should haue lest the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) He set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouifions for warre, which were plenteoully filled. Neither were He and his Affociates contented with the great abundance of spoile which they carried abord their ships; and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to thew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they overthrew and brake in peeces the Statuas vnto him there erected. This done, they hafted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twentie miles thence: whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all hast to take renenge. Hee thought to have taken the Athenians with their trustie friends, busie at worke in ransacking the Towne, and loading themselues with spoile: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed foot hee had with him, and three hundered horse : whereof leaving at Chales onely a few to burie the dead , Hee marched thence away speedily towards Athens: thinking it not unpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their victorie, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chaless. Neither had he much failed of his expectation; if a Fooot post, that stood Scour for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descried him a far off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to athens. It was midnight when this Post came thisher: who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme; and with all speed made readie for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there; who feeing the many lights, and other fignes of buffe preparation vitall in fuch a cafe, understood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselues till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the wals. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compaffe about by Sea, and had no cause of hast) yet having in the Towne some mercinarie souldiours. which they kept, of their owne, befides the great multitude of Citizens : they aduentured to iffue forth at a gate, whereto they faw Philip make approch. The King was glad of this ; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. He therefore onely willed his men to follow his example ; and prefently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight he gaue fingular proofe of his valour and beating downe many of the Enemics with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would have allowed, eucn to the veriegate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vietheir casting weapons against him, without endangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments befides, necreadioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even vnto the 40 sepulchers of the dead. The next day cathe the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late, in regard of what was alreadic past; but in good time, to preuent him of farisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth : and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Acheans were denifing upon warre, which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon: who being started up in the roome of Machanidas, did greater mischiefe than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly voon his Mercinaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedic extortioner ypon those that lived under him and one, that in his naturall o condition (meltranckly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him: fince his dexteritie was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleecing their wives; whom (hee would never fuffer to bee at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewells and apparrell. Her husband was so delighted Limite 32. with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to bee made linely representing her;

and apparrelled it with fuch coftly garments as shee vsed to weare. But it was indeede an engine, seruing to torment men. Hercof he made vse, when hee meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose monie hee was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this counterfait Apega flood, and there wie all his art of perswasion, to get what hee desired, as it were by good will. If he could not fo speede, but was answered with excuses: then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife Apega (who fate by in a chaire) could perfwade more effectually. So hee led him to the Image, that role vp and opened the armes, as it were for embracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nailes, the like whereof were also sticking in the In breafts, though hidden with her clothes; and herewith she griped the poore wretch; to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernement. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Atolians, as Machanidas and Lyeurque had done before him. By these hee grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopamens vertue hee flood in feare; and therefore durft not prouoke the Acheans, as long as they had fuch an able Commander. But when Cyeliades, a farre worse Captaine, was their Prætor; and all or the greatest part of their Mercinaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his 20 beloued Occupation of warre : then did Nabis fall upon their Territorie; and wasting all the feilds, made them distrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Atheans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had fet downe, what proportion of fouldiours cuerie Cittieof their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themsclues with the care of this businesse; for a smuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding joy and thankes they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That, whilest hee made warre vpon Lacedemon, Hee ought not to leave his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some 30 Companies into the Ile of Eubaa; that so he might securely pursue the war against Nabis. Immediatly they found out his deuice : which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his war against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was affembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing war against Nabis; hee brake vp the Affemblie, with cucric mans good liking : whereas in former times, Hee had Leene thought no better than one of the Kings Paralites.

It greited the King to have thus fayled in his purpose with the Achaans. Nenertheleffe he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and fo returned by Co. 40 rinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philoeles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyraus, and even the Cittie of Athens. But the Romans made such hast after him by Sea, thrusting themseives into everic of these places; that he could no more than wreak his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time fingularly beautified. So He destroyed all the workes of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble: which they had in plentie, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe beene Masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe: but caused his mento 50 breake the verie stones, that they might be unserviceable to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus revenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: and there made provision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Atolians: to whose Parliament, fhortly to be held at Naupactus, he fent an Embassage; requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

CHAP.4. S.10. of the Historie of the World.

Sulpicius the Roman Conful encamped vpon the River of Apfus. Thence he fent forth Apuffins, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armie to wast the borders of Mace. don. Apultius tooke fundric Castles and Townes ; vsing such extremitie of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wan by force, that none durst afterwards make refistance, vnlessethey knew themselues able to hold out. Returning towards the Conful with his spoile, He was charged in Rere, vpon the 10 paffage of a Brooke, by Athenagor as a Macedonian Captaine : but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their bootie, with which they arrived in safetie at their Campe. The fuccesse of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet served to draw into the Roman freindship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Athamanians; and Bato, the forme of Longarus; a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their affiftance vnto the Conful, who thanked them : and faid, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entredinto Macedon : but that the freindship of Aminander, whose Countrie lay betweene the Atolians and Theffalie, might be perhaps auaileable with the Atolians, to flirrethem vp againft

So the present care, was wholy set vpon the Atolian Parliament at hand. This ther came Embassadours from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Maceionian spake first : and said, That as there was nothing fallen out , which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his Master and the Atolians: fo was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves without good cause; to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to confider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the ** **Etolians : and yet notwithstanding had been angrie, that the **Actolians*, by making 30 peace with Philip, had no longer neede of fuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busic, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which thefe Burbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For even after the fame fort had they leant their helpe to the Mamertines: and afterwards delinered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subject vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect healleadged many examples, adding, That in like fort it would happen to the Atolians : who, if they drew fuch Maffers into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to confult about Warre and Peace : the Romans would ease them of this care, and to fend them fuch a Moderator, as went cuerie yeere from Rome to Syracufe. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilest as yetthey might, and whilest one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeares agoe made the peace which stil continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who It would have troubled the Romans, to frame fought to breake it now. a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the verie truth, in shewing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie.did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were fet on by them to speake next: who had to flore of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes palt, made war vpon the gods themselues, by destroying all their Temples in Attice. Herewithal they made a pitifull rehearfall of their own ecalamities: and faid, that if Philip might have his will: £tolia, and all the refu of Greece, thould feele the fame that attituded left; yea that Atthen it felfe, together with Atthensa, topiter, feers, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them. Then spake the Roman armes had not defended them. Then spake the Roman whose custing, as well as they could, their own eoppression of all those, in whose defence they had be rectofore taken armes, wentroundly to the point in hand. They faid, that they had of late made warre in the £toliam behalfe, and that the £toliam to do with the second with the second with the second with the second warre in the £toliam to the testiam to the second with the second with Carthage, wanted less them selected with Carthage, wanted less the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the £toliams to take part with them in their war and victorie, vnlesse they had rather perish with

It might eafly be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helper ere it was desired were themselfues carried with the war by more carnel motives, than a simple desire to helpe thole freinds, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have beene the cause, why Dorymachusthe Actolian Prator blifted them off awhile with a dilatoric answer: though hee told his Countrimen, That by reserving themselfues, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer away, first, in general tremes, I't had one much halt was an enemie to good counself: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But commaning never to the matter in hand, He passed to Detree, That the Prator might at any timecall and Assisting of the States, and therein conclude upon this businesses, any time and the contrar in notwith shading: whereas other wise it was valuatful to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Pataliaments, that were held at fet times.

Themeeting of PHILLE with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians inuade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of ATTALVS and the Roman Fleet.

Hilly was glad to heare, that the Romans had spod no better in their folicitation of the Exchans. He though them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perfeus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the fireights of Pelagonia against the Dardanius; I hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was independent on the contrage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least be leeue, that he was not weakely attended. And this may haue been the reason, why the same Perseus, a sew yeares before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Exchai by his father; whome earnest business the same present of enemies being left on either hand; it was thought, that the Musedonius Pleet vnder the adides, would serve to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodium and Romans, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his journie Wethward against Subjectus the Conful.

The Armies met in the countrey of the Dassacray, a people in the vtmost borders of Mseedon towards Alyria, about the monntaines of Candawis; that running along from Hamus in the North vntill they joyne in the South with Pindus, inclose the We terne parts of Macedon. Two or three daies they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open feild. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to fend forth fome of his light-armed Mercinaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmith. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at first ypon a Cast, and therfore sent for Perfeus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no leffe vnwilling to loofe too much in reputation; He made thew aday after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his T argettiers : and o fo gaue charge to Athenagor.es, one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Romans to fight; initructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behave themselves respecliucly, as opportunitie should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambulh; having fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had beene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hotly, that they draue him to an haltie flight, and purfued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not flaying to let them runne into the danger, discoucred themselues before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conful hereby gathered, that the 10 King had some defire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Armie, and setting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer vied before, but had taken thefe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce aboue fourescore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had never feene any of those beafts before. But now the fame Romans, (whilest possibly some were yet aline, which had knowen that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Auedon, bringing Elephants with them : whereof the Mucedonians and Greekes have none . Philip had patience to let the Conful braue, him at his Trenches: wherein he did wifely: for the Roman had 3º greater neede to fight, than Hee. Sulpicius was vn willing to loofe time: neither could he without great danger, lying so neere the Enemic, that was strong in horse, fend his men to fetch in corne out of the feilds. Wherefore he remoued eight miles off: prefuming that Philip would not aduenture to meet him on even ground; and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to ouer run the Countrie. The King was nothing forrie of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleafure :euen till their prefumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them carelesse. When this was come to passe, he tooke all his horse and light-armed foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There he stayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages 40 that none should escape. The rest hee sent abroad the Countrie, to fall vpon the ftraglers: willing them to put all to the fword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The flaughter was great : and those which escaped the hands of them that were fent abroad to scoure the feilds, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight : so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was cre the Campe had newes of this. Bur in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themselues, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon fends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull : He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diui-50 ded themselves, accordingly as they met with advertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canualling the feild, tooke their taske where they found it. But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disaduantage: as comming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So they were beaten away : as their fellowes also might have beene, if the King had well bethought himfelfe, and given ouer in time. But while, not contented with fuch an haruelt, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in light : which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne fafetie. They ranne which way they could: and (as menthat lie in wait for others, are feldeme heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemie, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were loit. The Kings horse was flaine under him: and there had he beene calt away, if a louing subject of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was ouertaken, and killed. In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident raffineffe; and the Conful, with as much dulneffe; for this daies feruice. A little longer flay would have delivered the King from these enemies without any blow: since when all the feilds about them were wasted, they must needes have retired backe to the Sea.On the other fide it was not thought villkely, That if the Romans following the King, had fet vpon his Campe, at such time as he fled thither halfe amazed with feare of being either flaine or taken; they might have won it. But that noble Historian Li. nie, (as is commonly his manner) bath indiciously observed, That neither the one, 20 nor the other, were much too blame in this daies worke. For the maine bodie of the Kings Armie laie fafe in his Campe; and could not be fo altonished with the loffe of two or three hundred Horfe, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe; He was advertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Countrie; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perfeus was called away from custodic of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to doe formewhat betimes that he might fet the Romans going the fooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublefome neighbours. In confideration of this, Philip was defirous to cleere himfelfeof the Romans, as foone as he might. And to that purpose he sent vnto the Conful ; re- 30 ouesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night; and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemie, as if he had not ftirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not flow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of firength, which they had fenced (for it was a woodie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse ; being a square battaile of pikes, not fit for euerie ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more feruiceable in that case. But they were few ; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman sheild. The Macedanians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. 40 But to no purpole. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victorie (such as it was) laid open unto the Consul some poore Townes there about; which partly were taken by strong hand; partly yeelded for feare. But the spoile of these, and of the feilds adjoyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia. The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselues apace out of the Countrie. The King fent Athensgoras to wait vpon them home; whilest he himselfe went against the Etolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Actolians, who had referued himselfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe : as also that Pleuratus and the Dardsminns 50 were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no leffe bufic on the fudden, than before he had beene wife. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaime war, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invalion vpon Theffalie. They tooke and cruelly facked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they litted. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay difperfed, was like to haue taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the Etolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountainous Countrie.

About the fame time; the Roman Fleet, affifted by Attalns and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Egean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towns of oreum in the Ile of Eubara; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen to Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were given to the Romans; and the people, for flaues. Other attempts on that fide were hindred; cyther by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

ð. XII.

VILLIVS the Roman Conful wastes a yeare to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italie. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, MASANISSA, and VERA MIN A. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. QVINTIVS FLAMINIVS is fent against him.

Hus the time range away : and P. Fillius, a new Conful, tooke charge of the Warrein Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiors: whereof two thousand, haning served long in S:oldelt Souldiors: whereof two thousand, manned, in that they all and Africk, thought themselues much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vinto their owne chates at home.

They were (belike) of the Legions that had ferued at Cann.e: as may feeme by their complaint, of having beene long abfent from Italie; whither faine they would 30 haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villus dealt with them, it is vincertaine. For the Historic of his yeare is lost; whereof the misse is not great; since hee did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as wee find in Liuie, hath adorned this Villius with agreat exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuie Lini.L. $20 him elfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may teafonably believe, that Fillius his veare was idle.

In the beginning of this Ascedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could have bin expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, agoodly and firong Towne, which neyther Hannibal, nor after him Afdrubal, had beene able 40 to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like fort Cremon: was attempted; but faued herfelfe, taking warning by her neighbouss calamitic. Amilear a Carthaginian, that had flaied behind Afarubal, or Mage, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard: they fent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to vinderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behould them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilear, who made warre in Italie. Herevnto it was added (perhaps left the meffage might feeme otherwife to have favoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitive slaves belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walk up and down in Carthage; which if it were so, then ought they to be reflored backe to their Mafters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embaffadours that were fent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Mafaniffa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphan. Vinto Mafaniffa, be-against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchfale vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to descrue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were fomewhat ferupulous in the matter : and faid. That having beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, Hee ought first of all to delire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed notto conferre vponany, fauc onely vpon fuch as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke sit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginisms made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilear : bani- 10 thing him; and confifcating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as manie as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requilite, give fatisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they fent a great proportion of Corneto Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Mafaniffa would hauelent vnto the Romans two thouland of his Numidian Horle: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embaffadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans bulled in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilear and his 20 Gaules : they laid feige vnto Cremona; where L. Firius a Roman Prator came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilear the Carthaginian died in this battaile : and the fruit of the Victorie was fuch, as both made amends for loffes past, and left the worke casie to those, that afterwardes should have the mannaging of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leifure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to give contentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to affure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising 30 and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a journie (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to tric a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Conful, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince, whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Armic.

d. XIII.

The Romans beginne to mike warre by negotiation. T. QVINTIVS winnes a passage against PHILIP. Thessalie wasted by PHILIP, the Romans, and Atolians. The Achaans for faking the Macedonian take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. PHILIP delivers Argos to NA-BIS the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after fnch a trifling manner. It was their vse, to give battaile to the Enemic, as foone as they met with him. If heerefuled it, they belieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his difadvantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the fibtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation:

wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued, Their treasurie was poore, and stood indebted, * manie yeares after this, vnto pri- *Lin-L.34. nate men, for part of those monies that had beene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie averse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driven the Senators greedie of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being wearie of the flow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie; that they might have the lesse need to relie your their Confederates. So they leanied eight thou fand foot and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminus the new Conful into Mscedon. Their Naule, and other meanes could well hane ferued, for the fetting forth and transportation of a greater Armie : but by straining themselves to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the fullenance of those that are too manie and too farre from home) have bred some icalousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost fome friends, yea perhaps have increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This prefent augmentation of the forces was verie requilite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embaffadours; requefting that eyther they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it ovncourteoufly, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke unto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkeable. They said, That it was not their manner to vie the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to affoord it; That they could not honeftly take part with Attalus, their good friend though hee were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friendes vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betweene them. In such louing falhion did they now carrie themselues, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally, at their entreatie, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will verie soone appeare. T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the fupply decreed vnto him; which confifted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had ferued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Conful, (whom at his comming hee presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the River of Apfins or Sons. It was manifest, that cyther the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon through the poore Countrie of the Daffarcti:ns; or elfe winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had alreadic two yeares together mispent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals : whereof they could neyther carrie with them flore sufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which divided the South of Epirus from Theffilie: then should they enter into a plentifull Countrie; and which, by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South born der. Neuertheleffe the defire of winning this paffage, was greater than the likelihood. For the River of Ap/us, running along through that Valley which alone was open betweene the Mountaines, made it al a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge:

a verie narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius affaied to climbe in the Mountaines : but finding himselfe difappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was verie easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing, for the space of fortie dayes.

This long time of rest gauchope vnto Philip, that the warre might bee ended by Gggggg

composition, upon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Conful had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conful would have him to fet all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had do ne to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to give libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late : but vnto such, as had beene long subice vnto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinguilly his claime and Dominion over them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare, that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever. He could well be pleafed to make fuch amends, as might feeme convenient in the 10 judgment of some free State, that had not beene interested in those quarrels. But herewithall Quartius was not fatisfied. There needed, (hee faid) no judgment or compromise; for a fmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwayes beene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his ownedefence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars; and when the Conful was required to name those Townes, that he would have to be fet at libertie; the first that hee named were the Theffalians. These had beene subjects (though conditionall) vnto the Micedonian Kings, ever fince the dayes of Alexander the Great and of Philip his father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians; the King in a rage demanded, what sharper Condition Hee would have laid vpon him, 20 had he beene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of fuch discourse.

After this; the Conful strone in vaine, two or three dayes together, to have preuailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had wel wearied himselfe, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heard man, fent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beafts in those Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by paths; and therefore undertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemie. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was falt bound; and, being promifed great reward, in cafe he 30 madegood his word; had fuch Companies, as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trausiled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and refted in the day-time, for feare of being discouered. When they had recovered the hil-toppes, and were about the Macedonians, (though undiscouered by them because at their backs) they raised a great smoke; whereby they gaue notice of their fuccesse vnto the Coful. Some skirmithes, whilst these were on their journie. T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smokearise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were fent: He preffed as neare as be could vnto the Enemies Campe; 40 and affailed them in their thrength. He preuailed as little as in former times, untill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, aftonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made al speed away to saue himself. Yet anon confidering, that the difficultie of the paffage must needes hinder the Romans from pursuing him: He made a stand at the end of five miles; and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driven from a place of fuch aduantage, they should hardly make good their partie against 50 the Enemic, vpon equall ground. Neyther was Philip himfelfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hastie retrait he could visit, to forfake their Townes and Countrie; carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perfwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly relifled him: which they might the better doe, for that hee could not stay to vie any great compullion. He also himselfe tooke it verie greiuously, that he was driven to make fuch wast of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrie, which had ever been well affected vnto him : fo that a little hinderance did ferue, to make him breake off his purpose; and withdraw himselfe homeinto his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Etolians and Athanamians, when this fell out, were even in a redineffe to inuade Theffalie; whereinto the wates lay more open, out of their feuerall Coun-10 tries. When theref ... e they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they forestowed not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while : but they had gotten so much before his comming, that He, in gleaning after their haruell, could not finde enough to maintaine his Armie. Thus were the poore Thelfalians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies since had made shew to be verie defirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates, not knowing which way to turne themselues, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by assault : Metropolis and Piera y ecided vinto him. Rhage he belieged: and having made a faire breach vet was vnable to force it; fo floutly it was defended both by the inhabitants, and 10 by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, houered about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be diffressed. So the Conful, having well neare spent his viduailes, & feeing no hope to prenaile at Rhage; brake vp his fiege, and departed out of The falie. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meet him at Inticyra, an Hauen towne of Phocis, on the Gulfe of Corinth : which Countrie being freind to the Macedonian, he prefently inuaded; not fo much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated betweene The saie and other Regions, wherein he had busines, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wan by affault: many were yeelded up vnto him for feare; and within short space he had (in 30 effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Confuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this war, ic yned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Euber ; and afterward laid liege vnto Cenchree, an Hauen and Arcenal of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their defire to leave the part of Philip : fince it might come to paffe, that Corinth it felfe, ere long time were fpent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaying to Corinth, now verie shortly, should be rendred vito their Nation, by fauour of the Romans. But there were other Motiues, inducing the Acheans to prefer the freindship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilest being entangled in a dangerous war, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of fuch counfale, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poisoning of Aratus their old Gouernour : His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirois, and other people their Confederates, and his owned ependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long fince to hold him as a necessiscie enill, euen whilest they were vnable to bee without his affiltance. But fince by the vertue of Philopamen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, fo as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well sublist, as having him to freind: then did they onely thinke how evil he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessarie. It angred him to perceiue how they flood affected : and therefore he fent murderers, to take away the life of Philopamen. But fayling in this enterprise, and being detected: Philopam.

he did thereby onely fet fire to the Wood, which was throughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopamen wrought fo with the Acheans: that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with-draw themfelues from the Macedonian Cycliadas, a principal man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for flewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip : and Ariflenus chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyne them in societie with the

These newes were verie welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans; making promise, that they should have Corinth restored 10 vnto them, if they would for take the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achains was held at Sieyon, to deliberate and refolue in this weightie cafe. Therein the Ro. mans and their adherents defired the Acheans, to joyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwife, the Embaffadours of Philip, whom he had also fent for this busines, admonishing the Achains of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way advance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Acheans to vnderstand, That hee, who could be fatisfied with fo little at their hands, knew himfelfe vnable to gratifie them in anv reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel; who remem- 20 bring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the prescruation of the ancient League. But in fine, the fenfe of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly fold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance, That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation the Decree paffed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this war. With Attalus & the Rhodians : they forthwith entered into focietie with the Romans (because no League would be of force, vntill the Senate and People had approved it) they forbore to decree any focietie at the present; vntill the returne of those Embaffadours from Rome, which they determined to fend thither of purpofe. The Megalopolitans, Dymaans, & Argines, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not relist, nor yet with honestie thereto give affent. For this their good will, and greater which they shortly manifested, the argines had folittle thanke; that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, upon a folemne day at Arges, the affection of the Citizens difcovered it felfe fo plainly, in the behalfe of Philip; that they which were his Parti- 49 fans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might have any small affishance. Philoeles, a Licutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth; which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos: whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude readie to joyne with him; He casily compelled the Achean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gave him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatic: whilest as yet with his honour he might seeke it, and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conful would shortly be chofen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the fooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought it best, fince more could not be done, to prædispose things unto a conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay

CHAP.4.S.13. then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay ; now (as is supposed) the Golfe of Ziton, in the Agaan Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian ; an Embassador of Attalus; the Admirall of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Atolians and Acheans. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliadus, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he faid) none but the immortall gods : yet mildoubting some treacherie in the Atolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he should fet all cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewise whatsocuer he held of theirs in Illyria; and what locuer about Greece or Afia he had gotten from Piolemie then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoiled in the late warre between them. The Rhodians would have against he Countrie of Peraa, lying ouer against their Iland; as also that hee should withdraw his Garrisons, out of diners Townes about the Helleftont, and other Hauens of their freinds. The Acheans defired restitution of Argos and Corinth : about the one of which they might, not uniuftly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their confent. The Ætolians tooke vpon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leaving it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, what focuer he held that had at any time beene theirs. Neither were they here-withall content : but infolently declaymed against him, for that which he had lately done in The sile; corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten . To answer these malapert Atolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to row nearer the shore. But they began to plie him a fresh : telling him, that he must obey his betters; vnlesse he were able to defend himselfe by force of armes. He answered them, (as he was much given to gybing) with fundrie scoffes ; and especially with one, which made the Roman Conful vnderstand, what manner of companions these Etolians were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise, the rest of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take (poile from (poile : yet could be get no better an answer, than Exercit. ) that they would sooner take Atolia out of Atolia. Titus wondered what might be the Posto. 1. 17. meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened betweene their friends, to hold up the quatrell by fending voluntaries to ferue on both fides, that should spoile both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece: He faid it was strange that the Arolians should be so carefull thereof, since divers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeed no Gracians: wherefore he would faine know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make flaves of those Atolians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat smiled; and was no whit offended, to heare the Etolians well ratled vp; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that general demand of fetting all Greece at libertie; Philip acknowledged, that it might well beseeme the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might beseeme his ownedignitie. But that the Æiolians, Rhodians, and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee should be hereunto compelled: it was he faid, a ftrange and ridiculous in solence. The Acheans he charged with much ingratitude : reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honors. Neuertheleffe he faid, that he would render Arges vnto them : but, as touching Corinth, that he would turther deliberate with Titus himselfe. Thus he addressed himfelfe wholy to the Roman Generall : vnto whom if he could give fatisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late warre, (he said) was onely defensive; they having beene the offerers; or if he gave them any occasion, it was onely inhelping Prufas, his fonne-in-law; neither did hee fee why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Groue and pleafant walkes thereabouts : what could be doe more, than fend Gardiners thither with yong Plants; if one King of another would frand to aske such recompence. Thus he iested the matter out: but offered neuerthelesse, in honour of the Romans. to give backe the Region of Peras to the Rhodians; as likewife to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that daies conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leifure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many ; and he ill prouided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduisea- 10 bout them. For your being foil provided of counfaste, faid TITV s, you may even thank your felfe; as having murdered all your freinds, that were wont to adule you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night : excusing his long stay by the waightineffe of the things propounded; whereon he could not fuddenly tell how to refolue. But it was beleived, that hee thereby fought to abridge the Atolians of leifure to raile at him. And this was the more likely; for that hee defired conference in private with the Roman Generall. The fumme of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was. That he would give to the Acheans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewife to the Atolians that hee would grant fome part of their de. 20 mands; and to the Romans, what soeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his affoicates heard, they exclaimed against it: faying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips care: who thereupon delired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, hee would fuffer himfelfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning : at what time the King entreated them all, that they would with fincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediatly conclude it. if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had alreadie tendered; or other- 10 wife, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embaffadours to Rome, where hee would referre himfelfe to the courtefic of the

This was even as Quintius would have it: who stood in doubt, least a new Conful might happen to defraud him of the honour, which hee expected by ending of the warre. So he casily preuailed with the rest, to assent hercunto : for a smuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for feruice in the warre; and fince, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in warre or peace. Further he willed them to fend their feuerall Embassadours to Rome: which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtayning any thing to their prejudice. Among the reft he perfuaded King Aminander, to make a journie to Rome in person : knowing wel, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had alreadic (though as yet he knew not fo much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of fatisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romani, in vndertaking to fet Greece at libertie. But this (they fayd) could neuer be effected; vnleffe especiall care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrie, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in servi-

they were breifly cut off in the middest of their Præface, with this one demand: Whether their Mafier would yeeld up Corinth , Chalcis , and Demetrias : Hereto they made answer, That, concerning those places, the King had given them no direction or Commission what to say, or doc. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips defire of peace; wherein they faid hee did no better than trifle. Yetmight his Embaffadours have truly faid, That neither the Atolians, dehaurs, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treatic required by name, that 10 Chelcii and Demetrias should be yeelded up. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of these Townes ? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaans had fome right; (though their right were no better, than that, having stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine vnto an Other) Philip had alreadie condescended to give it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would have been alleadged, even against the Greekes in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quinting his freinds; that so he might have had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Successor had beene decreed vnto him. But fince He was appointed to continue Generall: neither his freinds at Rome, nor Hee himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to give eare vinto 20 any talke of peace.

Philip, feing that his Acheans had for faken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling him-

selfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeares past, since the Lacedemonians under Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had beene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Acheans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force confifted in a manner wholly in his Mercinaries: for he was a Tyrant; though stiling himselfe King. Yet he forely vexed the Acheans: and therefore feemed vnto Philip one likely to frand him in great flead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be configned ouer into his hands; in hope, that fuch a benefit would ferue to tie him faft unto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedamonian, by giving some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his fonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made fome foruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnleffe by decree of the citizens themselves He might be called into it. Hereabont Philodes dealt with the Argines: but found them so auerse; that, in open assemblic of the people, they detested the verie name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philoeles, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was readie to receive. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Armie into it by night; and gaue him peffeffion of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argines : who for verie loue had for faken the Acheans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the T yrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principal! men, understanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staied behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver.

50 pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were difmiffed without more adoe. But if any flood long ypon the matter: or plaied the theines, in purloyning, their owne goods; they were put to the whip and belides loffe of their wealth, bad their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely fuch, as might ferue to make him gracious with the rafeall multitude: abro-

Also a great imposition of monie was laid upon all those, that were thought able to gating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poore. By fuch art of oppressing the great ones, it hath beene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselues of the Vulgar for a time.

As foone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He fent the ne westo T. Quintius; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it : fo as hee tooke the paines to croffe ouer the Streights into Peloponne fus, there to meet with Nabis. They had foone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fixe hundred of his Mercinaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Acheans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, referuing the finall conclusion of peace betweene them vntill the Warre 10 of Philip should be ended, which after this continued not long.

ITVS QVINTIVS, as soone as he understood that he was appointed to have Command of the Armic, without any other limitation of 20 time, than during the pleafure of the Senate; made all thinges readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no leffe failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwardes wholly to relie vpon

Plut in vitaT.

Titus had in his Armicabout fix and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neyther of them knew the others frength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Theffalie; and thereupon addreffed himfelfe to feeke him out. They had like to have met vnawares, neare vnto the Citie of Phera; where the vant-courriers on both fides discouered each other; 30 and fent word thereof vnto their feuerall Captaines. But neither of them were ouerhastic, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them fent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foor, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while : returning finally backe into their seuerall Campes, with little aduantage vnto cyther side. The Countrie about Phere was thicke fet with Trees: and otherwife full of Gardens and mud wals; which made it unproper for service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diflodged, intending to remove back vnto Scotufa in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ferued with al necessaries. Titus coceiued aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it onely to wast the Coun- 40 tric. There lay betweene them agreat ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuerthelesse they encamped not farreafunder, both the first and the second night; though neyther of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third daie was verie tempestuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then fent they forth discoucrers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon fent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Atolians had not beene desperate, the Romans their fellowes had beene driven backe into their Campe. Yet, all relistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed : so that Titus himselfe was 50 fame to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the descat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thick and tumultuoufly, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own; if he could vie an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose; informuch as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hils, which for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word fignifying as much, Cynofeephale. As foone as he was on the hil-top; it did him good to fee that they of his owne light armature were bufie in fight, almost at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. He had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his aduantage: for almuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vie: the roughneffe of the place among those Dorsheads, as they were called, feruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheleffe hee found conucnient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaugorder vnto his Captaines, to follow with the reft; embattaling them as they might. Whilest hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to thrinke; as being fallen vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He fets forward to helpe them : and they no leffe haltily draw vntohim for fuccour; having the Romans not farre behind

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalang to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult peece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great (quare battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now ysed in our moderne Warres and being in like manner vied, as are ours; was not to bee relifted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it felfe held together vndiffolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in verie close order; fo that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherfore it is no maruel, if the Romans gaue back: eueric one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come nearer vnto the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus to finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that fill the Phalane bare downeall which came in the way. But in the meane while hee observed. That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able, through the much vneuennesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: foas eyther they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or elfe (which was worfe) vpon defire eyther of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to bee partakers in the worke, ranne foolifhly along by the fide of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder He made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these il ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should bee done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as having no one man appointed to comand that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnv fefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip having fix and twentie thousand in his Armie (as he is said to have beene equall to the Enemie in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and soure thousand lightarmed: fo shall there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof hee himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalarx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quinting is readic now to charge. The Phalans, having vivally fixteene in File, mult, when it confifted of feuen thousand, have well neare foure hun-50 dred and fortie in ranke : but foure hundred would serve , to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or feuen and thirtie Files mightbee cut off. and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to euerie man of them three foot of ground: this Lib.17.

Front must have occupied twelve hundred Foot, or two hundred and fortie paces;

that is, verie neare a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaines free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie distoyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not cuerie where to be found. Here at Cynofcephale Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men : the reft were faine to frand ftill and looke about them; being hindred from putting themselues in order, by the roughnesse of the Logges keads. But the Remans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming up vnto them; nor found any difficultie in maffring those enemies, whole reet were in a manner bound by the difcommoditie of the place. The verie first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give backe; and the comming on of the Legions, to betake themselues vnto slight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, feeing the victorie on that part affured, left the profequation of it vnto others : and being followed by twentie Enfignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fallout) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable peece of worke; and mainly helpfull to making of the Victorie complete. He confidered that Fhilip, in purfuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on fo farre; as that himfelfe with his fellowes, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was alreadie gotten aboue the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand; and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalane, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindmost rankes of the Philans, all of them indeed faue the first fine, were accustomed, 20 when the batailes came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their foremen: and so were they doing at the present. This was an other great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx, That it served neyther for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were fo, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mefopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in fuch order, that all the foure fides of it were as fo many Fronts looking fundrie wayes, because hee expected that he should be encompassed round: vet it is to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loofe order, that fo with eafe they might turne their 20 weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be conidered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their own ground; not being able to follow ypon the Enemie, vnleffe their hindmost rankes could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for relistance. Therefore his men, being otherwife vnable to helpe themselues . threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King him felfe had thought vitill now, that the fortune of the battaile was cueric where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyfe behind him, and turning a little afide with a troupe of Horfe, to fee how all went: when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee presently betooke himselfe to slight. 40 Nevther staid he afterwards in any place (except onely a small while about Tempe there to collect fuch as were dispetfed in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Mucedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about feuen hundred: of the Maceilonians about eight thousand were flaine; and fine thousand taken Prisoners.

T. QVINTIVS falleth out with the Etolians; and grantes truce unto PRILIP, with conditions, upon which the peace is ratified. Libertie proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romansquarrell with ANTIOCH VS.

CHAP.4.S. 15.

He Ætolians wonderfully vanted themselves ; and desired to have it noised through all Greece, That the victorie at Cynoseephale was gotten (in a manner) wholy by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootic; by lacking the Community the Romans were busied in the chace. Titus therefore being offended to reach the most of the bootie; by facking the Macedonian Campe, whilest both at their vaineglorie, and at their rauenous condition; purposed to teach them better maners, by regarding them as flightly, as they thought highly of themfelues. He also well perceived, That by vsing them with any extraordinarie fauor, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians, But this displeasure brake not forth yet awhile.

After the battaile Titus made hast vnto Lariffa, a Citic of Theffalie: which he prefently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had fent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages what soeuer in writing, betwixthim and others. of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aducrlitie, he forgot not to prouide for the safetic of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Lariffa might well perceive, that he gaue them as alreadic loft. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Etolians cuer time to Philip; gaue vp themselves vnto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynoscephala. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Perca, a Region of the Continent ouer against their lland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatic of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: for a fmuch as they awaited not the good leifure of the Romans; but with an Armie of their owne, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Acheans and o. ther their freinds, gaue battaile to Dinocrates the Kings Leintenant, wherein they had the victorie, and confequently recovered the whole Province. It angred Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to inuade his Kingdome; wasting and spoiling, as if all bad beene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all hast, of six thousand foot and fue hundred horfe: wherewith comming upon them, he draue them, with little or no loffe of his owne, and great flaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to The [[alonica.

In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the fame time, be thought it wisedome to yeeld vnto necessitie; and therefore sent in all hast Limnaus and Demost henes, with Cycliadas the banished Achaan, in whom hee reposed much considence, Embassadours vnto Titus. These had conserence along while in private, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whomethey, were gently entertained, and in verie freindly wife difmiffed. It feemes that they had Commiffion, toreferre all vnto Titus his owne diferetion; as Philip him felfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto them a Truce for fifteene daies: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman General, In the meane season ma-

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vsed freindly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had beene required at his hands; offering yet further, to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Etolian, infulting oner him, faid it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length give vp to the Leolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him fpeake, whether he would, or not. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoling himselfe, said it should be otherwise; Thefe were Theffalian Townes, and should all be free:one of them onely excepted, which not long agoo had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be given to the Atolians. Hereat Phanens cried out that it was too great an injurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had fometime belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to confider that by an ancient Couenant betweene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to have nothing faue the pillage and captives. It is true, that there had beene fuch a Condition in the former warre: but it ceafed to be of any validitie, as foone as the Atolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to vinderstand, asking them whether they thought it resonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be delinered into subjection of the Atolians. The rest of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with these angrie passages betweene the Roman and the Atolians: neither had they great reason, to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to give them libertie, though they had stood out against him, even till verie feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they oppoled not themselves; but gave their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that moved Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, belides that laudable cultome by him before alleadged; was, the fame of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing necre toward Europe, He had also perhaps yet a greater motine; even the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And hee was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadours from the Macedonian, and fundrie States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Confuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood verie earnestly against the peace; alleadging friuolous matter of their owne suspition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip offering to stand to what socuer was demanded. and the letters of Titus preffing them to accept this offer, on the one fide; and the importunitie of the Conful on the other ; who faid, that all these goodly showes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as foone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senatours hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assemblie of the People; by whose sourceigne attthoritie it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vinto the King. So ten Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece : in which number were they; that had beene Confuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their aduice. That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would verie faine haueretained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chaleis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better setled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Acheans; and all the other Greeke Townes which Philip held, as well in Alia as in Greece, restored vinto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were. That before the celebration of the next* Ishmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of al the Greeke Townes which he held, and configne them ouer to the Romans: That hee cirps, Legat, 9; should deliver up vnto them all Captines that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of war, reserving to himselfe onely fine of the lesser fort, and one of extraordinarie greatnesse, wherein sixteene men laboured at euerie oare: Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres next following, by euen portions. Hereto *Linie addes, That he was fo: * *Lin.L. si. bidden to make war out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde northathe observed this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. 50 Foure hundered talents hee had alreadie deliuered vnto Titus, together with his yonger fonne Demetrius, to remaine as hoftage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at fuch time as he lately fent his Embassadours to Rome : when it was promiled, that the monie, and his fonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this monie were reckoned as Hhhhhh part of the thousand talents, I cannot find : and it seemeth otherwise, for as much as yong Demetrius, who together with those foure hundred Talents was given for hoitage, remained fill in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Lettersalfo were then fent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bithynia: giuing him to vnderstand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bythinian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie; and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materially fince the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wife that they to had not leifure to examine the conformitie of Prufias to their wil.

Al Greece rejoyced at the good bargaine, which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the £tolians found themselves agreived that they were vtterly neglected; which was to the rest no smal part of their contentment. The Baotians continued to favour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselues. There were fome among them wel-affected to the Romans; who feeing how thinges were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; faying, that they were no better than loft, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnleffe at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to have an hand in the execution, yet 20 neuerthelesse did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wife, that howsocuer they durft not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected within awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Herevpon Titus requires of the Buotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred feuldiors, which he had loft by them, to have paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In flead of making any fuch amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not 20 take as good fatisfaction. He fends Embassadours to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had happened: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had descrued. Herewithal he fals to wasting their Countrie; and beliegeth two fuch Townes of theirs, as did feeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadours of the Achaens and Athenisms, (especially of the Acheans who offered, if hee needed them, to helpe him in this war; yet befought him rather to grant peace vnto the Baotians) preuailed fo farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of fuch as were knowne offendors.

In like fort, though not fo violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Atolians would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That itwas the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne handes all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre ferued as an introduction to the Warre to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to bee reaped of this and manie other victories. Wherefore to flay the progresse of badrumors, when the Ishmian games were held, which in timeof peacewere neuer without great folemnitie and concourse: Titus in that great affembly of all Greece, caufed proclamation to be made by found of Trumpetto this effect, Thatthe Senate

50 and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did wil to be at libertic, free from Impolitions, free from Garrisons, and living at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubarns, Achaans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Theffalians, and Perrhabians. The fuddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men. so as though they applauded it with agreat shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durit scarce credit their own cares. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thankes; which they rendred now to T. Quintins with fo great affection, as that they had welneare smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

CHAP.4. S.15. of the Historie of the World.

This good will of all the Greekes, was like to bee much more availeable vnto the Ramans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in their Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof; no fooner were these Ishmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hegefranse and Liftus King Antiochus his Embaffadours: whom they willed to tignifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in A/a, and not vex them with warre: as also to restore what soeuer he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolemie or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassiadours, that he should not passe ouer his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person creit were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greeker; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gane vnto the Etolians, whom they thought it no wisedome to offend ouer-much, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Theffalians; all faue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had been eabandoned by T. Quintius to the Atolians in the last Treatie with Philip. The Atolians contended verice arnesty about Phar falus and Leuc, ss. But they were put off with a dilatorie answere, and rejected vnto the Senate: for how soeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despight of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede (though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acrocorinthus ) for that all which were partakers of the Achean Commonwealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they coulde defire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had bin their owne Carners. Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would have given the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubwa, to his sonne and successour King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubarans, should bee suffered to enjoy their libertic. Orestis, a little Province of the Kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeilded vnto the Romans long crethis, and fince continued true to them : for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free Estate by it selfe.

These businesses being dispatcht: it remained, that all care should be vied, not howto avoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most case and prosperitie. Wherefore Embassadours were sent both to Antiochus himfelfe, to pick matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to prædispose them vnto the affilting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found : as also how their Embassadours and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

The VV arres of the Romans with ANTIOCHVS the great, and his adherents.

What Kinges, of the races of SELEVCUS and PTOLEMIE, raigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochusthe great.

LEVEVS NICATOR, the first of his race, King of Alia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. Hee wastrecherously flaine by Ptolemie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is faid) beene warned before by an Ora- 20 cle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer have read that any mans life hath beene preserved, or any mischance avoided, by the predictions of fuch Deuilish Oracles. Rather I beleeue, That many fuch predictions of the Heathen Gods, have beene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the euent.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father: who furrendred vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonics, when hee vnderflood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ce- 30 Taunus had great cause to seare, that the death of Seleneus would not be vnreuenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, eyther with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceraunus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleueur. It is faid of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modestie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not profecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should have vrged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonius Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Alfo Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gsules, were set voon him by 40 the same Nuemedes. With these he fought a great battaile; wherein though otherwife the Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolemie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he foone gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berofus the Genebrard, lib. Chaldean dedicated his Historie of the Kings of Affyria; the same, which hath since beene excellently fallified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one fonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentic and ninth olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fif- 50 tieth yeare of the Kingdome of the Greekes; when he had raigned nineteene yeares.

Antiochus, furnamed Theos or the god, had this vaine and impious title given vnto him, by flatterie of the Milesians; whom hee delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He leld long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolemie Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolemie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Ladie Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters have understod that Prophecie of DANIEL: The Kings daughter of the South, Shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which fol-

Ptolemie Philadelphus was a great louer of Peace and Learning; and (fetting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne fifter Arsinoe) a verie excellent Prince: howfocuer, the worthieft of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, He fent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Jewes for the Bookes of Mofes and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bin verie great: for He had fet at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in flauerie throughout all Agypt; and hee had fent vnto the * Temple of God in Hieru/alem verie rich Presents. Wherefore Eleanar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie; which Ptolemie caused to be translated into Greeke, by seuentie two of the most grave and learned persons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the feuentic two Interpreters, or (as they are comonly called) the Seventie; Iefes the fonne of Sirach, is thought by Genebrard to have beene one: who that he lived in this Age, it feemes to me verie fufficiently proved by Janfenius, in his preface vnto Ecclefiasticus. The whole passage of this businesse between Philadelphus and the High Prieft, was written (as h Iofephus affirmes) by Ariflaus that hiofandiaco was employed therein. Fortic yeares Ptolemie Philadelphus was King reckoning the that Booke time wherein he inyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towardes his end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had beene in his former yeares in which time he boasted, that hee alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had beene referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: o. therwife, the Gowt, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne errour. He was the first of the Kings, derived from Alexanders Successions, that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp. Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at fuch time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his second marriage, hee vied his first wife with no better regard, than if thee had beene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet aduentured not to feck revenge; vntill her own sonne Seleucus Callinicus, was of abilitie to be King. This was two or three yeares after the death of Ptolemie Philadelphus: at what time shee poysoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her sonne, murdered Berenice, together with a sonne that shee had borne to Antiochus, Iustine reports, that Berenice faued herfelfe, together with the yong Prince her child, awhile in the Sanctuarie at Daphne: and that not onely fome the Papills yong Prince for clinic, awfined in the Sanctain each Definer, and inclinication of the College of Afa prepared to fuecour her, but her brother Ptokimic Eurogetta, King of Egypt, came to refeue her with an Armie; though too late, for the was flaine being they have the fore.

With fuch cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, fucceeding vnto his Father that had fifteene yeares beene King, beganne his Reigne. His subjects were highly offended at Middendo bis wicked nature; which they discouered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was at Colen. And like, that his Estate would have beene much endangered, if Ptolemie Euergetes, who 11/11.17. came against him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrie, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolemie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they fided with the Egyptian; who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well descrued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Energetes home into Agypt; went about a dan-Hhhhhhh 3

gerous peece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne subjects because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had beene much better, by well deferuing, to have changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet hee prepared : in furnithing and manning whereof he was at fuch charges, that hee scarce left himselfe any other hope, it that should miscarrie. Herein hee embarqued himselfe; and, putting to Sea, met with fuch a tempest, as denoured all faue himselfe, and a verie few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamitie, having left him nothing else in a maner than his naked bodie, turned nevertheleffe to his great good; as anon after it feemed. For when his Subjects understood, in what fort the Gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his estate; and, 10 prefuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered him their fernice with great alacritic. This reuined him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Agyptian, he made readie a mightie Armie for that purpole. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sca. He was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great bataile: whence he escaped hardly: no better attended, than after his late shipwrack. Hasting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemic would foone be at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochia Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompense of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Afia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeares olde, yet ex- 20 tremely ambitious; and therefore glad of fuch an occasion to make himselfe great. He leuied a mightie Armie of the Gaules; wherewith he fet forwards to helpe his brother; or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised and having no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeares. No fooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Agyptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came voon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing him felfe to have the better Armic. So Seleneus was vanquiflied againerand faued himfelfe, with fo few about him, that hee was verily suppofed to have perillat in the battaile. Thus did Gods justice take revenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might have beene 30 thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brothers death; as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts delire. But the Gaules, his Mercinaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him; and deuised how to strippe him of all that hee had. They thought it verie likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should best bee pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asa. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransome himselfe with monic, asif he had beene their lawfull Prifoner. Neither were they fo contented ; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once moreto tric his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season sit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiothus fought with him, and was beaten; which is no great meruaile; fince he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gaules his owne fouldiers, than of the enemie with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the fecond battaile, fought between the brethren, Selencus had the vpper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which furname was given him, because he fought his prey vpon eueric one, without care whether hee were prouoked or not) foared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Having fetcht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father in law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained verie louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This he soone perceived : and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolued to bestow himselfevpon Ptolemie: his owne conscience telling him, what cuill he had meant vnto Seleucus, his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expectar his hands. Infidelitie can finde no fure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax . Wherefore he laid him vp in close prison: whence though by meanes of an harlot hee got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of theeues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his warres with his brother. Hee therefore made a journie against Arfaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his cuill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered fo closely to him, that he was take prisoner. Ar saces dealt freindly with him, and difmiffed him, having enery way given him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his unhappie reigne of twentie yeeres. He had to wife Laodice, the lifter of Andromachas one of his most trustic Captaines; which was father vnto that Achaus, who making his advantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he stilled himself) a kings though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice hee had two fonnes; Seleucus the third, furnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres: in which time he made war vport Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of bodie through fickneffe, and in want of monie, He could not keepe his men of war in good order: and finally he was flaine by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Achess, who flue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled verie wifely, and faithfully a while; Antiochia, the brother of Seleucia being then a Child.

NTIOCHYS was scarcely fifteene yeeres old, when hee began his reigne, which lasted fix and thirtie yeeres. In his Minoritie, Hee was wholygouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man; and one which maligned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull fer-uants. This vilde qualitie in a Counsailor of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himfelfe; the fucceffe of things wil fhortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Ægypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong boy likewife, as hath elfwhere been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who releined Aratus and the Acheans: who afterwards tooke part with Gleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chaced out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race.

CHAP.5 . S.2.

The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given him by the Agyptians; not fo much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recoucred some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyfes, when hee conquered £gypt, had carried into Persia. He was readie to haue made war vpon the lewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meere conetonines of monie, refufed to pay vnto him his yeerely tribute of twentie talents: but he was pacified by the wisedome of tosephus a tew; vnto whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes, that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Calefyria, with Palastina and all those parts of the Countrie that lay nearest vnto £gypt, were held by the £gyptian; either as having fallen to the share of Ptole- 10 mie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battaile at Ipfus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the trouble some and vnhappie reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucida; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned fix and twentie yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtie and ninth Olympiad. It may feeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iefus the fonne of Sirach his booke, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there faith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtich yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may there- 20 fore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirtie yeeres, were the yeeres of Jefus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Lewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes: Hermias the Counsailor, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptian; for the recourrie of Calefyria and the Countries adiopning. This counfaile was verie vnseasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and fought to make himfelfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrie. Neuertheleffe Hermias, being more froward than wife, maintained fifly, that 30 it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to fend forth against a rebellious Captain other Captaines that were faithful; whilest He in person made warre vpon one, that was like him felfe a King. No man durft gain fay the refolution of Hermias; who therfore fent Xenætas an Achaan, with fuch forces as he thought expedient, against the Robell; whilest in the meane season an Armic was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Calefyria. The King having marched from Apames to Landicea, and so over the Defarts into the Vallie of Marfyas, between the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Atolian, that ferued vnder Ptolemie. So hee confumed the time there awhile to none effect : and then came newes, that Xenatus, his Captaine, was destroicd with his 40 whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrie, as farre as vnto

Xemetas, while he was yet on his iournic, and drew neare to the Riuer of Tignis, received many advertisements, by such as fled over vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Valo were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against the King. This report was not altogether falle; but Malo himselfe shood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessifier. Atmetas therefore making show, as if he had prepared to passe the River by Botes in face of his Enemie: lest in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Campe, and with all the floure of his Armie wan our Tignis, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe. Asolo heard of this, and sent forth of his his campe in page impediment: but hearing that Xematas could not so be stopped, He himself dislodged, and took his journic towards Media; leating all his baggage behind him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as districting the faith of his owne sould be the supplementation of the supplementati fouldiours : or whether thereby to deceine his Enemie ; the great follie of Xenatas made his stratageme prosperous. For Xenatas, having borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whomhe was advanced vnto this charge; did now prefume, that all should give way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of ving the fword. Wherefore he fuffered his men to feath, with the prouisions which they found readie in the forfaken Campe; or rather hee commanded them fo to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should eherish vp themselves against the journie, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting 10 the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other fide of Tieris, But Mole went no further that day, than hee could cafily returne the fame night. W herefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept : hee made such hast backe vnto them, that hee came you them early in the morning, whilest they were yet heavie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had spent at supper. So xenotes and a verie few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe : the reft were flaughtered, without making relitance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tigris, was casily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to faue their owne lines. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebell marched vnto Seleucia, which he prefently tooke; and, masteing within a little while the Provice of Babylenia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red Sea, or Bay of Persia, He hasted vnto Susa; where at his first comming hee wan the Citie : but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this busines.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilest he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Mar/yas; filled him with great forrow, and his Campe with grouble. He tooke counfaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduited by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Calefyria; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them. This counfaile was put in execution with all convenient haft. Yet was Epigenes dismiffed by the way, and foone after flaine, by the practife of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counfaile given, contrarie to his owne good liking and allowance. In the journie against Molo, the name and prefence of the King was more available, than any oddes which hee had of the Rebell in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good fucceffe, nor any other confideration, would ferue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore hee thought it safest for him, to affaile the Kings Campein the might time. But going in hand with this; Hee was difcoucred by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backeto his Campe: which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in fight. The King was thus forward in giving battaile to Molo, upon confidence which hee had that many would revolt vnto him. Neither was he deceiued in this his beleefe. For not a few men, or Enfignes: but all the left wing of the Enemie, which was opposite vnto the King, changed fide forthwith as foone as euer they had fight of the kings person; and were readie to doe him feruice against Molo. This was enough to have won the victorie: but Molo shortned the worke, by killing himself; as did also divers of his friende, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne fwords.

After this victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laudice, daughter of Offulnedates king of Pontus, which was married vnto Intellogue while before had brought forth a fonne. Fortune feemed bountifull vnto the king: and therefore he purposed to make what vse he could, of her freindly disposition while it lasted. Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, He judged it convenient to viste his Frontiers; were it onely to terrific the Barbarians, that bordered ypon him. Hereunto his Counsilior Hermias gaue affent: not so much respecting the kings honours.

About these times, Acheus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to fet a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria : but the same of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, madehim quit the enterprife 3 and fludic to fet fome handsome colour on his former prælumption. It is verie strange, that Antiochus neither went against Acheus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purpofes: but wrote vnto him, fignifying that he knew al; and vpbrayding him with 20 fuch infidelitie, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traitor : who being alreadic detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by fubmission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Calefyria or what elfe he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopator in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a verie strong Citie neare vnto the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Eucrgetes having lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, 40 have changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanitie of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Atolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Calesyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne forrie, that he had vsed so much faith and diligence, in seruice of an vnthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie, he began to have regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselse vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthie of these two Kings; He offered to deliver vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whileft 50 he was deuising about this treason, and had alreadic sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practife was detected; and he befreged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemics Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his refeue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleete of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Country, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a journic into Agypt it felfe. Agathocles and Sofibius bore all the fway in Egypt at that time : Prolemie himselfe being loth to have his pleafures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetic of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as fecretly as might be, for the warre : and neuertheleffe, at the fame time. to presse Antiechus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this busines, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicis, as likewise from the Atolians; according to the viuall courtesie of the Greekes, defiring to take vp the quarrell. These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sofibius : who entreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilest this Treatie lasted great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsailors perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victorie would be their owne; if they could get, for monie, a fufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. I Antiochus heard onely what was done at Memphis, and how defirous the Gouernours of Agypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beleefe, not onely for that hee knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadours, comming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceived, by the cunning of Agathodes and his fellow. Antiochus therefore hauing wearied him felfe. at the long fiege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not win : and being defirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Egyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promife that he would be readie to hearken vato equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be fo courteous, as he would faine have feemed; but onely to lull his enemies alleepe, whileft he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Acheus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Agyptian would have vied, He vled himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeare better served, little force would be needfull: for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld onto him, fince Ptolemie prouided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse he gave audience to the Embaffadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Agypt: pleafing himfelfe well, to dispute about the instice of his quarrell; which hee purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were instorno. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Selencus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall confent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipfus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no fuch bargaine. They faid, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had won Caleforia, and the Prouinces adioyning for himfelfe: as alfo that he had fufficiently gratified Selenens, by lending him forces to recouer his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needes have Achieus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antischus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deale fo with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and feeke to joyne him in Confederacie with his owne fourreigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe : contrarie to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a verie puillant Armie, was comming vp against him out of Leypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the veere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuerthe leffe he draue them : and, proceeding onward in his journie, wan fo many places that he greatly increased his reputation; and therby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neare together: many Captaines of Ptolemie for sooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Agyptian had the courage to meet his Enemie in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Matiques were the better fouldiors (forthat the frength of both Armies confifted in Mercinaries, cheifly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gaules) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arfinoe his lifter 10 and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other fide: each of them rehearling the brane deedes of their Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, wherby to valew themselues. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would have beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the advantage of these beasts, He draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein hee fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Groffe of his Enemies battaile, and wan the vi-Storie; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the feild aboue seuentie thousand foot, and fix thousand Horse: whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foote, and not 20 foure hundred horse; yet the same of his ouerthrow, tooke from him all those places which he had lately wonne. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in searc, lest Ptolemie and Acheus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors vnto the Egyptian to treat of peace : which was readily granted ; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie, to vex himselfe thus with the tedious busines of warre. So Ptolemie, having staied three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subjects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Acheus was not comprised in the League betweene these two Kings: or if hee had been eincluded therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe ftrong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason. For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this fide of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither washe, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwife, and carried beyond himfelfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie : but Cozen german to the King, as hath 40 beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Lagdice, as was her fifter the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestievnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Agypt held him in the nature of a freind : and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing. For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell betweene his fonnes-in-law, had no reafon to take part against the more honourable. As for the Agyptian: Hee was not 50 onely flothfull; but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of £eypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to scrue in the late Expedition; began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse element, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercinarie Greeke; which had hitherto kept them in streight subsetion. Thus brake out a warre, betweene that Kings and his subiects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby washed much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have beene spent; as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achew. As for Antechor: He had no Gooner made his peace with the Application.

his care to the preparation of warre againft Actum. To this purpole beentred into 10 League with Attulus; a that 60 he might dittract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all fides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were fuch, that within a while he had pent by Actum into the Citie of Surdes, where he held him about two yecres belieged. The Citie was were it frong, and well with audic 16 oas there appeared not, when the fecond yeere came, any greater likeliheod of taking it, than in the first yeeres feige. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretar found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Castle it fells was yound a verie high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable: a salfo the Towne wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sura, was in like manner structed youn steepe Rockes, and hardly accessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carkasses of Horsesand on the teasts, year and fometimes of men, yeld to be throwne. Now it was observed.

by Lagaras, That the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reafon of their food which was there neuer wanting, vêed to flie vp wito the top of the Rockes, and to pitch yount he was; where they refield without any diffurbance. Obferuing this often, he reafoned with himselfte, and concluded, that those partes of the Wall were left vinguarded, as being thought vinapproachable. Hererof hee informed the King: who approaced his indegenent, and gaue who him the leading of fuch men, as hee delired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The functile was agreeable to that which Lagaras had afore conceived; and, though with much labour, yet without refifance, he scaled those Rockes, and whileft agenerall affalt was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was, at other times vagarded, then withought vpon. In the fame place had the Perfant, wider Cyms, gotten into Sardes; when Crassus though himselfe secureon that tide. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past; and therefore out of memorie. Achsus held fill the Cassile: which not oncy seemed by nature impregnable, but was verie well stored with all necessires; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured; articless therefore was constrained to wast much time about it; hausing none other hope to prevaile, than by samishing the inclosed. Besides the visual tedous field expectation; his bussile.

heffe called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Baidrians, and Parthians with the Hyrer lims, had creded Kingdomerstaken out of his Dominions, you which they fill encroched. But het hought into rafe to let. Ashaw be reak looked againe. On the other side, there were some Agents of Palemie the Agyptian, and good friends ynto Ashawa; that made it their whole studie, how to deliver this belieged Prince. If they could resure his person, they cared for no more: but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countries under Taurus, he would some haue an Armie at command 5 and be strong enough to hold Antichus as hardly to worke, as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the waies in the Countrie; and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among thos Rockes, whereon the Calle 50 of Sardes shood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive

Ciphers, wherewith none faue he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the mellinger; he was a truftie fellow, and one whom Acheus found, by examination. heartily affected vnto the fide. But the Contents of the Epiftle, which were, That he thould be confident in the faith of Bolis , and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the bulinesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne : and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the commaund of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Castle of Sardes. Neuerthelesse other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselse 10 to some adventure. When the messinger had therefore passed often to and fro; it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Acheus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the reft. faue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen. * fome few excepted, have beene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a confultation together, that was, as k Polybius observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the fatetie of him whose deliuerance they vndertooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most, with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally thare betweene them ten Talents, which they had alreadic received in hand : and 20 then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Acheus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present monie, and with promife of confideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a service, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad; than were the friends of Acheus well pleased with the comfortable premises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readincffe on both fides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get vp into the Castle, and conneigh Acheus thence : Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him verie private audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the affurance of his liberall promifes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom he long had ferued. Hee accompanied Arianus vp into the Callle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achaus, touching all the weight of the bufineffe in hand. But he discoursed fo well, and with fuch gravitie; that there appeared no reason, of distrusting eyther honour to bee his faith or judgment. Hee was an old Souldior, had long beenea Captaine under Ptelmie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countriman of his; who kept a Fort that flood in their way; and there-Lies: in regard by had alreadic fundric times, given fafe paffage and repaffage vnto Arianio. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred 40 vp fome diffidence. Achaus therefore dealt wifely, and faid, That hee would yet flay in the Cast ea little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bo's three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would be iffue forth himselfe. Hereby in multiplicitie he tooke order, not to commit himfelfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But, as Polybius well notes. He did not confider that he plaid the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to fay, T hat he had to doe with one, whose knauerie could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had laid their plot thus, That if Acheus came forth alone, then should be easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus becap- 50 pointed to lead the wiv, as one that of late had trodden it oft; and Bolis following behind, fhould have an eye vpon Acheus, to prevent him not onely from eleaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe : to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Pre-

CHAP.5. $ 2. of the Historie of the World. fent. And in fuch order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way served, and Bolis in the Rere. Acheus made none acquainted with his purpole, till the verie instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his wife Landine; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall freinds to beare him companie. They were all diffeuifed; and one of them alone tooke you him to have knowledge of the Greeke tongue; speaking and answering, as need should require, for all, as if the rest had beene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuifing upon his bufineffe, and much perplexed. For (faith Polybins,) Though hee were of Crete, and prone to furmife any thing to the mischeife of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achaus, or whether Achaus himselfe were there. The way was verie vneafie, and in fome places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to staie in diners places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occasion, they were all of them verie officious toward Acheus; lending him their hands, and taking fuch care of him, as easily gave Bolis to understand, that he was the man; and so by their unscasonable dutie, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus laie in wait; Bolis whiftled, and presently clasped Achaus about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who fat vp watching in his Pauilion, expeding the event. The fight of Acheus, brought in bound vnto him, did so assonish the King; that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration : as also the next morning betimes affembling his friends together, He condemned Acheus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pittic towardes this vnhappic man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee fo, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischeiuous knaues against one Traitour, doth not rarely succeed 30 well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe, Aun traydor dos alleuosos. The death of Acheus brought such aftonilhment upon those which held the Castle, that after awhile they gaue vp the place and themselues vnto the King, whereby hee got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia. Some veres passed after this, ere Antiochus was redie for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Hyreanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings; and commonly subject vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes : then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleutus : vnder whose ponants of the Syrian Kings. The luftfull infolencie of one of these Leiutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinious, that was vanquished and thought to bee flaine by the Gaules; did ftirre vp Arfaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to feeke reuenge of injuries done, and animate him to rebell. So he flew the Kings Leiutenant; made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Selencius Callinians prisoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wanne repu-

40 seritie they continued untill the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Leiutetation as a lawfull King: and by good government of his Countrie, procured vnto himselfe such love of his subjects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors; 50 like as that of the Ptolemies in Leypt , and that of the Cefars afterwardes in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, encreased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Army, that they durst not meet him in plaine feild; but keptthemselues in Woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and paffages of Mountaines. The relitances they made anailed them not. For Antiochus had with him fo great a multitude, and fo well forted. as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, ia Woods and Streights betweene their Mountaines; it being easie to spare out of to great a number, as many as fetching a compasse about, might cyther getaboue the Enemies heads; or come behind, and charge them on the backe. I has did hee often employ against them his light ar mature: wherewith hee caused them to diflodge, and give way vnto his Phalanx3 vpon which they durit not adventure themfelues in open ground. Arfaces, the fecond of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelitie of his owne subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mightie an Inuader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and defarts, would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Eebatane in Meata, to give over the journie without proceeding much further. This not fo falling out; He caused the Wels and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemie must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoiled. By which meanes, and the reliftance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, He withdrew him lefte out of the way: fuffering the Enemie to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Gountrie; wherein, without some victoric obtained, hee could make no long abode. sintinchus hereby found, That Arfaces was nothing strongly prouided for the warre. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and 20 then forward into Hyreania; where he wanne Tambrace the chiefe Citie of that Pronince. This indignitie and many other loffes; caufed Ar/aces at length, when hee had gathered an Armie that feemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his delires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Arfaces craued peace, and at length obtained it: Antischus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom Hee could not make a subject.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians: one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors; but having gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthy-demus he fought a battaile by the River Arius, where he had the victorie. But the victoric was not fo greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which hee gaucof his owne private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was flaine under him: and hee himfelfe received a wound in his mouth, whereby hee loft fome of his teeth. As for Euthydemus; He withdrew himselfe back into the further parts of his Kingdome; and afterwards protracted the Warre, feeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadours passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrie of his was vniustly vsurped from him; Euthydemus answering. That He had wonne it from the children of the V surpers: and further, 40 That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, faue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should joyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus; and made him willing to grant peace upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father as Embaffadour in this Treatic of peace; was not a little auaileable vnto a good conclusion. For Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the kingdome; cauling him neverthelesse to deliver vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselse by oath, 50 to such Cournants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journie ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India: where he renewed with Sophagasenus, King of the Indians, the Societie that had beene betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subjectivato the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warreagainst Antigonus, rayled part of his forces out of their Countrie. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Westward, and was ouer-bufied in a great civill Warre: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, ftirre vp his Countrimen to Rebellion; making himfelfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title hee foone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestie of a King. Finally hee got vnto himselte, (hauing an Armie of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe, to ere Seleueus Nicator could find leifure to call him to account. Neyther did He faint or humble himfelfe, at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in field, as readic to defend his owne; fo strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking onely a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes. was continued by some Offices of lone betweene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promifed, to have some treasure fent after him; which hee left one to receive. Thus parted these two great Kings. Neyther had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any bufi-20 neffe worthie of remembrance with the Westerne Countries. The postcritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to have retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Augustus Cafar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, fent Embassadours with Presents. and an Epiftle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, Hee faid, That Hee had command ouer fix hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in fundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in divers Ages, even vnto the time of Constantine the great: being all peraduenture of the same tace. But Antiethus, who in this T reatie with Sophaga fenus carried himselfe as the worthier person. receiuing Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Garmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Afia, but on the hi-10 ther fide of Taurus, humbled them felues vnto him, and called him The Great: faw an end of his owne Greatneffe within few yeares enfuing, by prefuming to fland vpon points with the Romans; whole Greatneffe was the fame in deed, that his was onely in feeming.

may feeme to discharge him of so horrible acrime, as his Fathers death : yet the beautlinesse of all his following life, makes him not valike to have done any mischeife, whereof he could be accused. Having wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gaue himselfouer to sensualitie; & was wholy gouerned by a Strumper called Agathoclea, At her inftigation Hee murdered his owne wife and fifter; which had aduentured herselse with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him undertaken and performed with honor. The Leiutenant-ships of his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices what focuer; were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathocles, and her brother Agathocles, and of Oenanthe a filthic Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to 10 the great greife of all the Countrie, till Philopator died : who having reigned feuenteene yeares, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanesa childe of fine yeares old, begotten on Arimoe that washis fifter and wife. After the Kings death ; Agathocles beganne to take vpon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He affembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinarie forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Agypt with Ptolemie the first, and would not be accounted Agyptians; as neyther would the Kings themselues) and bringing forth vnto them his lister Agathoclea, with the yong King in her armes; beganne a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his fifter, but vnto the 20 faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relie. He befought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiteroully went about to fet the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall bloud. Herewithall hee produced before them a witnesse, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delinered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterseiting of teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that hee fpake; but flood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the 30 Affembly: Hee that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agatheeles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mightie, but neyther wife nor wel qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly beene his manner, by vfing his authoritie, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. Hee haled out of a Temple the mother in-law of Thepolemus; & cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to fuffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and vtter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the prefentinjurie done to Tlepolemus, they were fomewhat also mooued with feare of 40 harme; which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citic. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernment, as afterwards hee proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people: fo by the remedie which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uprore. Hee secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; and delinered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore fouldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But whileft the whippes were brought forth, and all things even in a readinesse for that purpose: there was brought vnto the Minister of Agathocles, a fad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moersgenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the dores open. Hee perceiung this, naked as he was, conneighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turkes lanizars. Being affured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus beene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and beganne to force the Palace : crying out, That they would fee the King, and not leave him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no leffe adoc than the Souldiors, though to leffe effect. So the old Bawd Qenanthe fled into a Temple : her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which hee easily gaue, and by apointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered up to the furie of the people. Agathodes himfelfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His fifter was dragged naked up and downe the fireetes; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of juffice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in peeces.

These troubles in Farpt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochis; who had verie good leifure though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon yong Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the fame defire, to get what part he could of the childes an effate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therfore the Agyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two Kings: who though they fecretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant, to divide betweene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was fent from Rome, to *Inflin 1/300 protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; Hee was verie foone found bufied, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Ægyptian, was sent into Greece to rayle an Armie of Mercinaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not find: and 20 therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was fent thither onely one of the three Embaffadours, oin the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath beene o Linder. shewed before, As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie : where winning many places, among the reft of his Acts. He subdued the Ienes; who feeme to have yeelded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they faw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of recei using helpe from Egypt. But Lindshame, it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopus came to nothing. For the verienext yeare following, which was (according to Eulebius) the same yeare that Philip was beaten at Cynofcephala; Antiochus vanquilhed Scopasin battaile, and recoucred all that had beene loft. Among the reft, the Jewes with great willing neffe returned to under his obedience; and were therefore by him verie sently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbeare to insude , and gaue it out, that he meant to bellow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie : either hoping, as may feeme, that the Countrie would willingly fobmit it felfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held our laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was veric much diffracted; hunting (as we fav) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attales, Philip, and the Greekes, promifed to affoord him great advantage, if he flould bring his Armie to the Hellefont. On the other fide, the flate of Laype being fuch as hath beene de 50 clared, feemed eafie to be swallowed vparonce . One while therefore hee tooke what hee could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Ienes among the reft, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Agyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Aegypt alone, He was about to make invalion upon Attalus his Kingdome; yet fuffered himfelfe cafily to be perfyaded by the Roman Ethbaffadors, and delifted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He fends Embaffadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpassed, That these his Embassadors were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not lincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour; they were content to give good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria: and shortly prepares to win some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; vet withall hee fends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irrefolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the fonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus : feeking each of their friendfhips, at one and the same time, when hee fought to make each of them a spoile. Thus was heacting and deliberating at once: being carried with an inexplicable defire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, and over-swelling fortunes. Howfocuer it was, He fent an Armie to Sardes by Land, under two of his owne fonnes: 20 willing them there to flay for him; whileft he himfelfe with a Flecte of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other veffels, intended to paffe along by the Coafts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in fuch places as held for the Aegyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilest the war of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. I hey lent vnto him a proud Embassage: wherby they gave him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because hee should not joyne with Philip their enemie, and helpe him against the Romans. It was infolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King. yet he tempered himselfe, and 30 without any flew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embaffadours partly vnto their whole Citic, by Embaffadours which he thither fent. He she wed his delire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, left his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought, there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly given to his Embassadours.

The Rhodians appeare to have beene a cunning people, and fuch as could forefee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what 40 had paffed betweene his Embaffadours and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian war was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala, They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to fit ftill; vnleffe the Townes on the South Coast of Alia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well: for that they had ever beene greatly beholding, to all the race of the Piolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aid they could voto al the subjects of the Agyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the fonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betweene An- 50 tiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a freindly offer, to bestow one of his daughters upon him in mariage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetarus, his brethren, wondered at this, But he told them, that the Romans would furely make warvpon Antiochus ; and therein finally preuaile. Wherefore he faid, That by abitayning from this affinitie it should be in his power to loyne with the Romans, and threngthen himselfe greatly with their freindthip. Contrariwife, if he leaned to Antrochus : as hee muit be partaker in his ouerthrow; to was he fure to be oppreffed by him, as by an ouer mightic neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie.

CHAP.5. S.4. of the Hiflorie of the World.

Antica bus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where hee tooke such order as hee thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lamp (acus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and obttinately strone to mantaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he failed vnto the 10 Helleftont: where having won fome Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he paffed ouer into Europe tide; and in thort space mattered the Cherlonefus. Thence went hee to Lyjimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and deltroied, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Atolian: opicated as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lylmuchia, by thrusting thereinto a Garrison. Hereunto Philip madeanlyver, that his Garrison did not oppresse the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and fackt it, as foone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not accepted as such; might appeare by the miferable cafe, in which Antiochus found Lyfimachia at his comming thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, cariedaway into flauerie. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified : as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countrie thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promites, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Cittie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwel, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a journie in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armiesleaning the other halfe, to repaire the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the convenient fituation, and former glorie of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it 30 highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdo me of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he thall dearely pay : and as after that victoric against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadlie wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus enfue verie speedily, after the reconquest of the fame Countrie, which was the last of Selencus his purchases.

ð. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with ANTIOCHVS, during their warre with PHILIP: after which they quartell with him. The doings of HANNIBAL at Carthage: whence he is chaced by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King ANTLOCHUS. The Leolians marmure against the Romans in Greece. The war of the Romans and Achains, with NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. QVINTIVS his Triumph. Peace denied to ANTIO-CHV's by the Romans.

Or the Romans, though they were viable to (mother their defire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was alreadic taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant thortly to make good, of this intended warre, folong as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, fince King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than verie friendly. Antiochus, at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inualion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also verie shortly after he fent Embassadours to them. to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them . This was whileft as yet they were bufied with Philip; and therfore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Cli- 10 ents vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worse, but more plaine, meaning, For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsailors sent from Rome, requited (as hath beene * shewed before) with a commination of war. this kings gratulation of their victorie; as also his long-professed amitie, and desire to continue in the fame.

These ten Counsailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorate before; fince, in regard of Antiochia, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree , That two of them 20 should visit King Antiochies; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vimindfull of the busines: wherein lest T. Quintins, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was lent from Rome of purpole, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other private instructions Cornelius had; wee may coniecture by the mannaging of this his Embaffage. For comming to Selymbria: and there viderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having beene sent by Titus, were at Lysima. chta, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counfailours) from Bargille, to be present at the Conference. Hegelianax and Lylias were 20 alfo there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptoric Conditions, which the Embaffadours present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the busines in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antochus had reason to deliver backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that verie earnefily, That he mun also give vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more abfurd, than fuch folly in the 40 Romans 3 as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that war, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his journie there was none probable, than a purpose to make war upon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith He praied them to let him alone; even as He, without fuch curioficie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what bulines had drawne him thither; namely, the warreagainst the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recourie of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Cherfonefus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrie, He derived it from Selenens: who made conquest thereof, by his wictorie against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betweene him and the other Kings, had beene till of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had beene feized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at fuch time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of busines, from looking vnto al that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to fland in feare of him, as if hee intended ought against them from Lyfimachia; fince it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his fonnes, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be greized with his proceedings in Min; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Agypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to joyne ere long with Piolemie, not onely in freindship, but in a bond of neare affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needes heare further, what the Embaffadour's of Smyrna and of Lampfaces, whom he had there with him, could fay for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampsacus being called in , began a tale; wherein they feemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; for a fmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the

Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them. Thus the Treatie held fome few daies, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laide their complaints in fuch fort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart wel fatisfied, and thereby to corroborate the prefent peace; were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend onely the goodnes of their fwordes; nor yet ouer-modefly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their inflice, forbeare the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were defirous to haflen into Agypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome ; and L. Cornelius, to preuent him thereof, and let the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was fent from Rome Embassadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie : which gaue him occalion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embaffadors, had good leaue to depart all together; and the King forthwith made readic, to be in Agypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Armie; and left him to ouer-fee the building of Lyfmachia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and failed vnto Ephefus. Thence he fent Embatfadours to T. Quinting: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such fort, as might fland with honeflie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aline. This made him beare another way from Agypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a greiuous shipwracke, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to have fafely re-cure, as might appeare, of the Roman war. But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lysimachia, (at leastwife not long before or after it) one of their Embassadours that had beene fent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counfaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to referented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to defire focietie with them, whereby they should bee bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he aduited him to doe quickly before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to have awaited fome fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be fatisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were follicited; and particularly the Atolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to fay plainconered his Port of Selencia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered : fe-

Jy whereto this entreatic tended: the froward an fivere made by the ***Etolian**, deciares them to have well vnderflood the purpole. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the **Roman**after the Victorie, as they had beene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had beene wronged, and defrauded of what was promisfed vnto them: **vpbrayding withall the **Roman**s, as men to them beholding, not onely for their Victorie ouer **Philip**; but euen for helping them to fet foot in **Oreces*, which else they neuer could have done. Hereto the **Roman** gaue gentle answerse; telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vter their griefes and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiothus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gave mater vnto the enemies of Hanmibal, wherewith both to pick a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they fo greatly hated. He had of late exercifed his vertue against them in the Civill administration; and given them an operthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the fway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject vnto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the reft. Neyther did they vie this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wife together, that who so offended any one of them, should have them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to 20 be foone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie. Hannibal was chosen Prator. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superjour vnto them during that yeare; yet had it not beene their manner to beare much regard vnto fuch an annual Magistrate, as at the yeares end must be accomptable to them. if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore fending for one of the Ouzstors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him : the proud Ouxfor fet lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduerfe Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place, were to bee chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled alreadic with the spirit of his future Greatnelle. But he had not to doe with fuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occu- 30 pied the place before. Hannibal fent for him by a Puriluant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique affemblie of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vidutiful stubbornesse of this Queitor had beene; but how vnfufferable the infolencie of all the Judges at the prefent was: whose vnbridled power, made them to regard neyther Lawes nor Magifirates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from yeare to yeare, & no one man be continued in that Office two yeares together. If this Law had beene paffed before he passed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps have beene in the power of II.nno, 40 to have brought him vnto necessitic of reforming another greinance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to legic by Taxation laied upon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting monie in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needfull charges. Hannibal confidering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes what focuer; and in what fort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhauft the Treasurie; but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vie, were thereby faine to load the people with needleffe burdens. Hereof 50 he made fuch plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to reftore, with fhame, what they had gotten by knauerie; and fo the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts; as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of *Hamibal**, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens fo they of the *Roman Faction, which had, fince the making of the peace vntil now, ittle regarded him, beganne to rage extremely, as being by him thip of their gotten goods, and il-employed authoritie, both at once, cuen when they thought them felues to haue beene in full posselfion of the vanquished *Carthage**. Where-fore they fent letters to their friendsat *Rome** wherein they complained, as if the *Barchine** Faction grew strong againe, and *Hamibal** would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, to hold *Carthage** in peace with *Rome** it hele enemies to the *Barchine** onely wany to hold *Carthage** in peace with *Rome** it hele enemies to the *Barchine** to might well crie out, That hauing done their bestalreadie to keepe all in quiet, they

19 might well crie our. That hauing done their befraireadte to keepeal in quiet, they faw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alledge, than their owne inuentions: they faid, That Hannibal was like vnto a wild beat, which would never be tamed: That Feeret meffiges pait betweene him, and King. Antiechus: and that the was wont to complaine of sidleneffer, as if it were harmefull to Carthage, with what elfe to like effect they could imagine. Thefe accurations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addreffing their letters craftify, eueri one to the belt of his owne friends at Rome, and fuch as were Senators; they wrought fo well, that neyther publike notice of their Confpirace was taken at Carthage, nor the authorite of the Roman Senate, waithing to the furtherance of their thage, nor the authorite of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their 2 malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is faid to haue admonthed the Fashers, that they should not thus dishonourably fabsferibe, and become Seconds to the accurers of Hamnibal: as if they would oppress, by suborning or countenancing talke witnesse against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time prevailed, nor vised their Victorie in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Roman were not all for great-minded as Scipio: they wished for forme such advantage against Hamnibal; and were glad to have sound in. Three Embassadours they sent ouer to Carlogge, C. Semilius, Q. Treentins, and CM. Claushus Markeiling, whose verienames import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hamnibal. These has using past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their commings of and, being by them instructed how to carrie themselves, gauco us, T hat they were 3 and, being by them instructed how to carrie themselves, gauco us, T hat they were fent to end some controuersies, betweene the Carthaginians and Masanista. But Hannibal had kept fuch good espiall vpon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That hee escaped them by flight : but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertment to rehearle the particularities. Having openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Affembly, He went forth of the Towne when it beganne to wexe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as hee might well trust. Hee had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place; whence riding all night, Hee came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-fide. There had hee a Ship furnished with all thinges needfull; as having long expected the necessitie of some such journie. So Hee bad Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrie, more than his owne. Paffing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; he found there in the Hauen some Marchants ships of Carthage. They faluted him respectively and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither he was bound. He faid, Hee went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the lland to make a facrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needs hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted couert,

He made them bring thither all their failes and yards to be vêd in flead of Tents, 50 They did fo; and feathed with him till it was late at night; at which time hee left them there alleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his courfe to Type. All that night, and the day following, Hee was fur enor to be epurfued. For the Merchants did neither make haft to fend any newes of him to Certhega, as thinking him to be gone Embalfadour: neyther could they, withour fome loffe of time, I fuch of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the miffe of fo great a person was diversly construct. Some gheffed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where hee had bin feene : and then the Roman Embaffadours, having none other errand thither accufed him (with an cuill grace) as a troubler of the Peace, whereby they onely difconered the mischiefe by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; milling the while their purpose, and cauling men to vnderstand, that Hee fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal, comming to Tyre the Mother-Citic of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whole great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinitie betweene their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his some in Daphne: who friendly welcommed him, and fent him vnto his Father at Ephelus, that exceedingly re-

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore forrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discoverie of their impotent malice, in chacing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make four fouldiors of base Asiatiques; as it had beene by his trayning and discipline, to make verie seruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinarie, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall confiderable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thoufand other fuch vexations, would be farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a defolate and banished man, than had been the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those Actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further ferued to hearten Antiochus, and make him leffe carefull to anoid 30 the warre; then should it further serue, to justifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it feemes indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is faid before, hauing newly sent Embassadours to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that Hee had any meaning to take armes; vnleffe by meere violence hee were thereto enforced. Onely the Atolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, delirous of innovation, and therefore practifing with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late beene answered with gentle words by one of the tenne Counsailours, 40 That the Senate would grant them whatfocuer with reason they should aske. But this promife was too large, and vnaduifed. For when their Embaffadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T.Quinttms, who fauoured them leaft. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for verie shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Countrie. For the Atolians were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed: faying, That these their Deliuerers had laid heauier setters vpon them, than formerly 50 they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian; likewise, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying loger in Greece, if the Romans had no other mening than what they pretended For Philip had made no de-laie, in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie; and the whole Countrie at peace, both with the Romans, and within it felfe. As for Antiochus: He made it his daily fuit, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, fuch as it was, might be confirmed, and firengthned by a League of more affurance. Neuertheleffe T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forth with to feize vpon Greece, as foone as he and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained still in his own hands Chaleis, Demetrias, and the A. exocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuation like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Quentius were the reports of the tenne Embassadours, that had beene sent ouer to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citic. Antiochus, they faid, would questionleffe fail vpon Greece: wherein he should find not onely the Etolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, readie to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe fomewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentine to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citiel, among the vulgar but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeare, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should bee readie to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African defired, and obtained, a fecond Confulthip, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal. For the prefent, the bufineffe with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would be a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereofalso hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be forrie; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeares before this, as is alreadic shewed, whilest he had warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans fake to bee at peace with the Acheans, neyther fince that time had he done any thing, whereby hee should draw 30 vpon himselsethis Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achaans; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which hee caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearfed) that thould flirre them vp, and cause them to be carnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at libertie: which noble Action was in some fort maimed, or incompleat, whilest the noble Citie of Arges was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greeks, duly to confider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argosa matter worthie to be vindertaken; or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could bee well contented to leave itasit was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this workin hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselues. The Athenian Embaffador made answere hereunto verie eloquently, and as pleating as he could deuife. He gaue thankes to the Romans for what was past; excelled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their ropolition: wherein vnrequested they freely made offer to continue that bourse, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had alreadic o late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was r. neare, such notable vertue and high deferts ill spoken of by some : which toose vpon them, out of their owne imaginations to foretell, what harme thefe deir Benefactors meant to dochereafter: when as Thankfulnes rather would saue required an acknowledge ment, of the benefits and pleasures alreadic received. Everie one found the meaning of this last clause; which was directly against the Atolians. Wherefore Alexander the Atolian role up, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient gloric, in those times when their Citie had beene the Leader of all Grecce, for detence and recourrie of the libertie generall; from which honour they were now fo farre fallen, that they became Paralites vnto those whom they thought mo it mightie; and by their bale affentation, would lead all the reft into seruitude. Then spake He against the Acheans, Clients that had beene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and fouldiors of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his adversitie. These Heesaid had gotten Corinth; and must now have warre be made 10 for their fakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Areas ; whereas the Ætolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes beene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Nevther did hee thus containe himfelfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing : forafmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcie, and the Acrocorinth; having beene alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could never be at libertie, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than bulinesses wherewith to find themfelues occupied, that fo they might have fome feeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrie? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie 20 their Legions home out of Greece : which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Atolians themselves did promise, and would undertake. That they would exther cause him to yelld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had beene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertic wrought so much with these Etolians; as did their owne rauenous defire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themsclues, that worse would vie it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neyther could they well diffemble this; making it no small part of their greinance, 30 That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene couenanted. That the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but leave the Townes and Lands in possesfion of the Atolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefes by them done in former times, made the whole Affembly especially the Acheans, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take fuch order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Ltolian thecues be enforced to keepe home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleafure of Titus: who faw, that by discountenancing the Etolians, He was become the more gracious with all the reft. But whether it pleafed him fo well, that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some 40 good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight anfivere: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsailors which had beene fent vnto him from Rome to be his affiftants in thefe matters of weight, were now enturned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedamonian warre; it was verie foone ended. For Titus vied the talpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nahu, both by Laid and Sea, as if he should have had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Nauic, and the Rhodian Fleet, were inuited to the feruice: as also Phing of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether 50 it were to get fauour fthe Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in feeking reuenge vpon A4,, that had done him injurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Adams, who fet outten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Atolians: ather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispofitions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; wherof they excused themfelues as well as they thought best. Thus are the Acheans now become the prime freinds of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Ltolians from that degree of fauour : like as they themselues hereafter (though not in all hast) shal bee supplanted by the same Lacedamonians, against whom they are now marching.

CHAP.5. $ 4.

Some of the Argines more bold than wife, began a conspiracie against the Lacedemonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and flaine: excepting a verie few; that escaped out of the Towne. The same of this Commotion, caused the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to bethere, before things were at quiet. But there was no stirre within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to alfaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedemon, than to consume time about other places; sespecially at Argos: for the freedome whereof since the war was made pittie it were, that the calamities of the war should thereon fall most heavily.

Nibis had in readines an Armie of fifteene thou and, wherewith to defend himfelfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercinaries: the rest, of his owne Countrie; but fuch as were of all others the worft, as manumifed flaues, malefactors, and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthic Citizens he flood in doubt: and fince he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Affemblie : and compaffing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselues ; they might, he faid, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest before hand and put in ward, al those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not onely the Citie and his owne person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which elle they might have incurred. Heercupon he cites and apprehends about fourc-score of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he fure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loofe. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abrode : what could it else doethan terrifie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose, his crueltie extended it selfe vnto fome poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the fireets, and flaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens; Heeturned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that to came on apace. He welcommed them with a fallie : wherein, as commonly happens, the fouldiours of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with loffe. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ranne the Countrie; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the fame time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid fiege vnto Gyttheum, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force; when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouernours within the Towne, equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or defire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, flue the Traitor; after 50 Whole death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintiue with part of his Armie came thither to Gyttheum: this Captaine of the Towne had nor the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to give vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safetie to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne a-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Arges, whereof he had the Gouernment with a thousand souldiors Mercinaries, and two thousand Argines: it being (as may feeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gyttheum: which hee thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was loft : then began they to thinke vpon finishing the war, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was fent Embassador to Titue: requesting onely, that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speake with him . This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake verie reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none; and that by many good arguments; whereof the fumme was, That what socuer they now did, or could, object vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That nei-10 ther for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them allead. ged, they ought to make warre vpon him; fince argos, and all other their allegations whatfoeuer, had not hindred them, in time of their more need of him, from entring into that League with him; which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith fatisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, for a funch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that fome other cause of this Inuation should be alledged. Wherefore hee said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Meffene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyne with Philip, when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but also in affinitie : and That his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, fince in the Articles by Titwo propounded vnto Nabis there was no reflicution mentioned, other than of ships by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may feeme to have beene objected onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise verie friuolous. As for Meffene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore notto haue beene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristanus, the Prætor of the 30 Acheans, verie well perceived: who therfore doubting left the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne instice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed his discourse to an other end. He entreated Nabis to confider well of his owne chate; and to fettle his fortunes, whileft he might doe it without hazard; alleadging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, & therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to furrender their Estates, and lived in great securitie, honour, and happines, as private men. Thus they discoursed untill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Arges; and requested them, to deliner vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counfaile with his friends. The iffue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the Citic of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon fuch Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of argos, and all the places thereon depending: Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them verice greiuous. He would not fuffer the Lacedamonian to have ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Iland or elf-where; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne lands; not to keepe any other 10 shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with impolition of an hundred talents in filuer to be paid out of hand, and fiftic talents yeerely, for eight yeares next enfuing. For observance of these Couenants he demanded fine hoftages, fuch as he himfelfe should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had beene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon instice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which hee himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp . But if it were thought reasonable, to difpensea little with the Roman faith , in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best freinds in Greece, by the extirpation of this T vrannie: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, have beene profecuted vnto the verie vtmoft. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themfelues by the spoile o of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Acheans, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister vnto the Atolians, and to fuch as curioufly pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King. and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterlie Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors :it was thought veric strange, that Lacedamon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the fame Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday : and He therein rooted by their authoritie, as their freind and Confederate. Nabis on the other fide thought himfelfe vn-20 mercifully dealt withall, by the felfe-fame Romans , whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinitie of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But falfly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and falfly was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himfelfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him: saue onely that for the banished Lacedemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; having among them Agesipolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a yong child was driven out by Lyourgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wines, as would be so contented, to line abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent vnto these demands; and fultained an affault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would foone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly ouercame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had beene propounded, He deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmedafterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, Hee thought the Romans more wicked than himfelfe; and was readie upon the first aduantage, to doe them all mischiese that he could.

The Argines had heard newes that Lacedamon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to fet upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remoue of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them joyntly should fet their hands to the getting of it; which no fooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Arges, where he was joyfully welcommed. He was descruedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Cittizens had laied hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himfelfe thereto, hee caused the libertie of the Argines to be proclaimed at the Nemass games; as ratifying it by his authoritie. The Citic was annexed againe to the Councell of Achaia; whereby the Achaans were not more strengthened, than the Argines themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little busines or none wherewith to set on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiochus was about to fend another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance who-

ly disposed vnto quiet; Scipio the African, that was chosen Consulat Rome, could not have his defire, of being fent Commander into Greece. The vnfincere meaning of Anioshus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Atolians, were held as considerations worthie of regard: yet not fufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honeit way, of confuting the Atolians, and of throughly perfwading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselues the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their foieintent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it felf.til occasion should be ripe, and cal them ouer again. Wherfore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, eyther found, or at 10 anie neare distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth : where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsaile; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Laftly hee gauc vp Acrocorinthus to the Acheans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to doe the like (which verie soone he did) at Chaleis and Demetrias; that so it might bee knowne, what liers the Atolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those pla- 20 ces. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes tellifie their good liking of that which Titus had faid and done : as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin fold into their Countrie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happie end; and by leaving the Countrie before his departure was vrged, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by jealousie and suspition of any cuill meaning. At his comming to the Citic, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodlieft of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three dayes together the Thew of his pompe continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthic of fuch a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had 30 before made Warre. All forts of Armes, with Statues and curious peeces of Braffe or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The fecond day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Maffe vnwrought; fome, in diuerfe forts of Coine; and fome, in Veffels of fundrie kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shieldes, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuerse Cities. There were also led the beafts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrias the forme of King Philip, and Armenesthe forme of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and 49 good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captines, by his procurement redeemed from

Not long after his Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embaffages, that were come out of Greece and Assa. They had all verie fauourable answerse, secepting those of King Antiachus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quimius, and the tenne that had beene his Counsailors; because their buffnesse was did to be fomewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embaffadours wondred. They faid vnto Titus and his Associates, That they could not differne wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betweene the Vistor and the vanquished; betweene those, that had jued alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrell. V not he Vistor, they faid, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure

the impolition of some Couenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had beene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vivall to demand and make restitution, of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed: fince it was reasonable. that each part should hold their owne, and neyther carrie it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the League and friend ship that had beene so long in conclusion, betwixt and tiochus and the Romans. Which being fo : they held it strange that the Romans 10 should thus infift on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to preferibe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia he should fet at libertie; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Ouintius answered, That since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vato them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept: Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take partin Asia with any that would feeke their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them for beare to meddle in Asia, that then Hee should abandon what focuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but no 20 reasonable nor pertinent answere, to that which the Kings Embassadours had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampfacus, or any other Afiatiques, whome they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that fought their loue, and had neuer done them injurie. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer up vnto them the Citie of Lysimachia, whereon of late he had bin at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopling it with inhabitants, that had all beene differfed or captine to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadours with great indignation alleadged : faying , that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so , as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to fet at libertie those Townes, which the King would oppresse and hold in subjeaion: especially fince those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell in that regard under the patronage, which Rome had affoorded unto all Greece befides. By this colour they might soone have left Antiochus King of nor many fubicets on the hither fide of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbeare to fay, That, vnleffe he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Afia, but therein to make new Alliances:

namely (as might be underflood) with fuch as were his fubicits. Wherefore they viged his Embaffadous to come to a point, and tel them plainly which of the fe two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleafing an fwere, which the Embaffadours could not hereto make; little wanted of gitting prefently defiance to the King. But they fulfered themfelues to be entreated, and were contented once againe to fend ouer P.Villins, and others that had beene alreadie with the King at D.Jimsebinshy whom they might receive a finall answer, whether these demands made by Quintins and his Associated would be accepted, yea, or no. By this reference of time, and the fruitlesse free sensing. Antisebins got the leisure of two yeares, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no 10 disposition to let him line in peace.

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spamiards. Of M. PORCIUS CATO. Iniuries done by MASA-NISS A to the Carthaginians: that fue to the Romans for instice in vaine.

most at the height of their Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilear a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene alreadie thewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be fuch willing partakers each of others fortune, that feldome afterwards eyther the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in 20 Gallia Cifalpina now called Lumbardie; it hath beene long fince rehearfed, betweene the first and second Punick Warres. As also it hath since appeared , how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neyther is it likely that the reconquest would have beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase:if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not beene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a flout Nation, light and swift of bodie; well practifed in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith readie to fight againe. 30 Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, woodie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had, but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature : fo as without much labour, they could neyther bee taken nor befieged. They were also verie poore; and had litle or nothing that might give contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoile their Land. In these respects they ferued excellently well, to traine up the Roman Souldiors to hardnesse and militarie patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territoric of their borderers, that were sub- 40 icct vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, seemes to have been e grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgment and to acknowledge no fuch vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vling their aduantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they bee demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, vie commonly this answere, It hath still beene the custome for vs and them, to fight one

Divers overthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligarians gave vnto the 50 Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselues in distresse; and brake it agains as often, when they thought it profitable fo to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrie they did little harm:

not fending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make war, faue on their owne ground.

CHAP.5. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

The Countrie of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became fubicit vinto the Romans: fo was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe-hide: and the Romans found in it the propertie of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian thewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any fide of it, the further parts would rife from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts, from which the Roman Armies lay furtheft, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a verie hardie Nation, and eafily flirred up to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good in telligence among themselues: and being divided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they feldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnited themselves together, for chacing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrowes: as delire of libertie, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking trmes.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make enacuation of this Chollerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercinaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be virguiet at home. They had also taken souldiers from one part of the Countrie, and yied them in an other; finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they rayled upon the whole Countrie; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise the Romans, vsing the service of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to have much businesse with them. Spaine was too farre distant, and withall too 30 great, for them to fend over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie, Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrie, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and fuch heedfull Captaines, as might be still readie to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did; and thereby held the Countrie; though feldome in peace.

Verie foone after the departure of Scipio, there was raifed warre in Spaine against the Romans, even your the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish warres following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Certhaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted fine yeares. This Victoric of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre : yet left it still remaining the cause of the warre, which after fine yeares brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconful, whom they flew; and had agreat Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to fend thither two Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat; yet not fo much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Conful the yeare following, and fent into that Province; found at his comming little leffe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniar ds were not of one minde: fome were faithfull to Rome; and fome were idle beholders of the paines

For this Mr. Cato was not onely verie notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed The Occupation of the Romans but so well furnished with all other vseful qualities, that verie litle was wating in him, which might feem requilite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was veric skilful in the Roman Lawes. a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any busines either private or 30 publike. Many Books he wrot: wherof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, and of hulbandrie. In matter of hulbandrie he was notable, and thereby molt increafed his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: fo as hee lived in perfect health to verie old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better fort of the Romans, was his great finceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein he had merited fingular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthic men; that were no leffe honest than himselfe, though farre lefferigid, and more gallant in behauiour. Otherwise, Hee was averie good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he never were out of his Element. He loued bufineffe fo well, or rather hated vice fo earneftly; that even ynto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore and fix yeares, He pleaded in his own defence; and foure yeares after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So beganne the Nobilitie of Cato his family; which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Vican : one, that being of like vertue and feruencie, had all his good purpofes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of fuch Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not veric dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie foldome free from infurredion, in one part or other. The Roman Prators therefore, of which two other years were fent ouer Commandersign Spaine (that was duided into newerne years were fent ouer Commanders into spame (that was deuded into rece Gouernments) did rarely faile of fuch worke, as might affloord the honour of Lomph. One flew thirteene thousand $pamards in a battaile; another tooke fittee 1 ownes, and a third enforced many States of the Countrie to fue for peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did fome laudable fertice; yet fo, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in itead of rice old that were flaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I have alreadie pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to fay, T hat the buline file in $pamerequired not the employment of a *Roman* Conful, from fuch time as Cate thence departed, whill the *Namantian* Warre barke ourse, which was verie longafter.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace: but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised al felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves and their obedient Citie : Masanisa fell to disputing with the fword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He beganne with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the leffer Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning fome part of it, feemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leaue obtained from their Mafters the Romans. They 20 had none other way of redreffe, than by fending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And furely they wanted not good matter to alleadge, if the Judges had beene unpartiall. For belides that Scipio, in limiting out vnto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrie: Masaniffa himselfe, now verie lately, pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, defired leave of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Countrie was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masanista had wherewith to justific his proceedings; especially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadours, what faithleffe people the Carthaginians were, and how il affected to the State of Rome. 30 There had latly beene fent vnto them from Hannibal one, that should perfwade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined, vpon forme fuspi-

tion of his errand; yet nevther arrefting him nor his thippe, had thereby affoorded him meanes to cscape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to kecke them downe. As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwaies, hee faid, been theirs, that were able to hold it by ftrong hand; and so belonged sometimes vato the Aumidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne : the Citizens of Carthage had no verie warrantable title, vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citic flood; or fearfely to fo much. For they were no better than ftrangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build vpon fo much ground, as they could encompaffe with an Oxe-hide cut into fmal thongs. Whatfocuer they held without fuch a compaffe, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfullenchrochments. This confidered, Mafaniffa requeffed of the Senate, That they would not adjudge vnto Rich vsurpers; the Countrie formetimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the fudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly, they fent ouer three Embassadours, of whom P. Scipio the fficen was sine and the chiefe, to decide the conficuents is the creatly giving them by infunctions, to leave all as they found it; 'withdout 'insking' any end one way or other. The Embaffsdors followed their directions; and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Majamija with a ftrong Armie flowfuld quickly prevaile, again those that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaime again the wrong. By fuch arts were the Carlosginians held, not onely from fliring in favour of King Antichus.

The Etolians labour to prouble ANTIOCHUS, PHILIP, and NABIS, to warre upon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. NABIS befregeth Gyttheum, and wasteth some part of Achaa. LL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed : it grieued much the Etolians to thinke, that they who had promifed vnto themselues the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes; were not onely disapointed of their couctous 20 hopes, but quite for saken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great accesse to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had beene taken from the Macedonian. This might have well sufficed them, if their defires had not beene immoderate: and their indignation, more vehement, than their defire. But they were not fo pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had unfufferable wrong. Wherefore they deuifed, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves, and give the Romans a for- 30 rowfull knowledge of the difference, betweene their enmitte and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deale with the Kingof Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to joyne al together in a new Confederacie; whose joynt forces could not in al likelihood but farre furmount those of the Romans, Acheans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the £tolians tooke in hand; and well befeeming them, for they were great darers. They fent Embalfadors to all these Kings, with perswalions as they thought most forcible. But Phi- 40 lip was irrefolute; and Antiochus willing to trie first all other courses. Wabis the Lacedamonian, who neyther (as Philip) had loft much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward; and not staying so much as to feeke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay fiege to Gyttheum, that had beene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Acheans, to whole care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponne (us, were not flow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neyther would they have staied long from repressing his violence by open warshad not some of them thought it wisedome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in 50 fending Embaffadours, and were aduited by Quinting to let all alone, and to wait for the comming of the Roman forces that would shortly bee among st them : Nabis was bold to give them juster cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territoric. Philopamen was then Prætor of the Achaans, who had long beene absent in Creie; making war there for his mindes lake and recreation. Vnto him the Acheans referred themselves, giving him leave to order the war at his pleasure; either staying untill the Romans came; or doing other wife, as he should thinke belt. He made all hait to releiue Gyttheum, by Sea; fearing lenthe Towne, and the Achean Garrison within it, should be lost, if hee vied any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Seaman, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeares agoe beene counted a gallant veffell, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleete lo good, as might encounser with that of the Lacedamonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed him felfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her talions. For his Admirail Gallie was flemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, (prang fo many leakes, and tooke in water fo fair, that the was faine to yeeld without further reliffance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall; all were prefently discouraged, and faued themselves with what fpeed they could. But Philopamen was not herewith danted. If hee had failed in Sea-ferusee, which was none of his Occupation; Hee faid that hee would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the fiege of Gyttheum, to ftop the Acheurs if they should inuade his Countrie, But you these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came inexpected; fired their Campe; and put all, faue a verie few of them, to the fword. Then marched he with all his Armie towards Lace Jemon : within ten mile whereof he was, when the T yrant met him; that had alreadic taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nabis would have beene readie for them to foone. Or if hee thou dome from Gyttheum, with any part of his forces; yet was it thought that he most ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost fecurely, in a long Troupe reaching fome fine miles: having their Horse and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs to beare off any fudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vinderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take appeared in the front of them with al his Armie; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his freinds, to marke the fituation of the Countrie about him, and to discourse, what might be fal an Armie marching the same way. Hee would suppose, That having with him there such a number of fouldiours, ordered and forted in fuch manner, and marching towards fuch a place; he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would be put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a fland? what peece of ground it were meete for him to feize vpon? and in what manner he might best doe it? in what fort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and under what Gard? in what fort encampe himfelfe? and which way march the day following? By fuch continually meditation Hee was growne fo perfect, that hee neuer met with any difficultie, whence he could not explicate himfelfe and his followers. At this time-he made a fland; and having drawne up his Rearc, He encamped neare unto the place where be was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompating them round with his fouldiours. The ground was rough, the waies bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the prefent greatly moleft him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achieuns lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philogemen understood this; and layd an ambushin place convenient; whereinto the Mercinaries of 2\(\chi abis\) fell, and were flaughtered in great numbers. Prefently after this he caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Acheans had a purpose to get betweene him and Lace Lemon, whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people, to take armes for the recourse of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would have beene forced. Some Companies he made to flay behind, and flew themselves you the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopamen was not fo to be beguiled. He casily won the Campe; and gaue chace to Nabu: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turneabout and make head. The Enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods. where they lay in couert all that day : Philopamen conceived a right, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chace whilest it was day; Hee led to forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinarie passages vnto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopamens Campe great flore of lights; thought that all had beene at reft: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie daies together after this, did Philopamen walt the Countrie round about, whilest Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without

The Roman Embassadours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie firong against Antiochia & Nahis, whom they knew 10 to be follicited by the £tolians. Verie faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promifes drew him to make thew, what focuer hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to reflore vnto him his some: and were contented to let him hope, that hee should receive other favours at their hands; and regaine possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for war against Intiochus in Greece; whitest their Embassadors that were with him in A/ia, denied otherwise to grant him peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long abfence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Plalemie and his daughter: together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings son, 30 which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or feemed to hinder the King, from giving audience in person to the Embassadors; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might have beene, and partly was, beneficial vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephefus; either by cunning, or (as Liuie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hamibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspition wherein hee held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lined, Han- 40. nibal indged the most worthie? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the fecond: and the third he challenged vnto him felfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be fo forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldest thou have said then Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee ? To whom the Carthagiman replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claymed it as due vnto my felfe. Now whether this were fo, or otherwise: the often and freindly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did for beare awhile to vie his counfell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King : and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was ; He 50 easily recoursed his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to fweareat the Altars, when hee was a little boy, That hee never should be freind vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine fur-

miles: but to know thus much, That as long as hee thought vpon war with Rome, fo long would Hannibal doe him all good feruice: whereas contrariwife if he intended to make peace, then should it behoue him to vsethe counsaile of some other

The Ætolians, and their freinds, were no leffe bufie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans : than were the Romans, in mustering vp their freinds in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vanting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victoric against Philip; that finally they preuailed with him: especially when the Roman Embaffadors had left him, without hope of peace, vnleffe he would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like fort with the Macedonian. But in vaine . Hee understood the Romans, and himfelfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improoue their owne forces to the vtmost : as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselues, without helpe from anie; sauc only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to refolution: the Athenian Embaffadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neare at hand. For want of a readie answer hereto they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the busines worthic of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared hims life against the Romans : it would be no fmall peece of fernice, to with draw from his freindship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panatolium, or Great Affemblie of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might ferue to appeale them. Hee willed them to confider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand, whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrie, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Masteric: the Atolians, as Malters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becomming * the Sticklers . As * Lindest, et

20 for those greinances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent milu Atolis, courses. He willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better forte, tought. they might doe to fend Embaffadours to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they defired: than thus to fet the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what hee faid or could say, it skilled not much. They had alreadic done ill, to make the Embaffador of the King, whose helpe they had fought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Roman: Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they defired seither as their right, or elfe by way of fauour. For with fuch Termes had they beene feafted once alreadic: and were by the Senatereiected vnto Titus: who, having it in his owne power, gaue them no fatisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely loffe of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the great should be entreated to come ouer in-they forgot no point of brauerie, whereby to vant themselves to the Kings Embas-50 fadours, and against the Romans. Titus defired of their Prætor, to let him fee a Copic of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, & their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their camp in Italie vpon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would have LIIIII 3 to Greece, as well to fet the Countrie at libertie, as also to decide the controversies depending betweene the Romans and Atolians. Such a Decree they would not

done better as the Ætolians are like to understand herafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the war they referred vnto the more private Councel of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the authoritic of a generall Affemblie. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councel! of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke, as any of the yongest heads could have done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chaleis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they fent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden : entring, some of them as freinds to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had beene driuen to flie thence, but was, by intercession of those that lo- 10 ued him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions that were not many, seized vpon a Gate: whereat they let in a Troup which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman faction. At Chalcis they sped not fo well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home : but they came so strong, that their purpose was discouered, and the Towne prepared to desendit selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer: saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans : who more infolently dominered ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By such R hethoricke they prevailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Townef-men replied, That they neither 20 found any abridgment of their libertie, nor needed any Garriton to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received iniurie. So this busines was dasht. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and defperate. Nabis their good freind, was Lord of the Towne: styling himselfe King; but, more truly, by all men called T yrant. He had wel-near eloit all, by meanes of the ouerthrow which Philopamen had lately given him : fince, he durft not ftirre abroad; and daily expected the mischeife, that on all sides threatned him. Wherfore he sent mellingers, one after other, to the Ætolians: requesting them, That as He had not beene flow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward; so They would be pleased to 20 fend him what helpe they might, fince his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath beene often faid, That the rauenous Atolians were onely trueto themselves,&regarded neither faith nor freindship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne endes. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his T yrannic, were in a manner confumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to assure Lacedamon unto themselues. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Damoeritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apedeti, where they were comman- 40 ded to be no wifer than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make war with the Acheans, or to doe ought elfe, faue onely what Alexamenus should command them: which were it neuer fo desperate, and in seeming against all reafon ; yet must they understand, that unlesse they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with brave wordes: telling him, that Antiochus was alreadie in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mightie Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of work, than of late with Philip: fince the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would fuffice to tread them downe. As for the Etolians, He faid, that if need should so require, they would prefently fend away to Lucdonon all the forces that they could go raife. But they they would prefently fend away to Lucdonon all the forces that they could raife: But that they were verie defirous at the present, to make as goodlie a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore

CHAP.5. 6. of the Historie of the World. with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabus to take heart; bring forth his men, that had beene long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. 2/4bis was glad of this; and daily exercifed his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his falhion to step aside alone to his Atolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned agains to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great worke that he had in hand : Hee then went aside to his thirtie Horseno men, and bad them remember the taske enjoyned them at their fetting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnlesse they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neare them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the fudden; and ftruck him down. The thirtie Ætolians neuer flood to deliberate vpon the matter ; but all flew in; and, before any faccour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nibis. Prefently vpon the fact committed, the T yrant his Mercinaries ranne vnto the dead bodie: where in flead of feeking revenge they flood foolifhly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his £tolians hasted into the Citic, and seized on the Palace: where hee fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were alreadie done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens; who seeing themselues free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had flaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall flocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horse, and made him their chiefe. So they fell vpon the Atolians that were idely stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamemus with not many of his Companie, were flaine in keeping the Citadell: and to those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who fold them all as bond flaues, In this doubtfull Effate of thinges at Lacedamon, Philopoemen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamenus (hould have done after hee had flaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetic, to incorporate themfelues with the Acheans, Thus by the enterprise, no leffe dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians, and the small but effectuall, travaile of Philopoemen; the Acheans made a notable purchase: and Lacedemon, that had hitherto bin gouerned eyther by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselues Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; whereof the name had fearce any reputation, when Sparts ruled ouer all Greece.

NTIOCHUS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lamplaem, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither fafe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to 20 winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was hee defirous with all speed convenient to shew himselfe in Greece;

where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a verie fmall number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was alreadie up in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, defiring nothing more than to breake loofe; and that the Atolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were readieto conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon infolent Barburians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made fuch a noise, as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King 30 was thinking to fend Hannibal into Africk, there to moleft the Romans, and fo give him the better leifure of vling his owne opportunities in Greece: Thous the Atolian came over to him, and bad him lay all other care afide; for that his Countrimen had alreadie taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serve to cut offall deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thous was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at fuch a time, when the verie reputation of his numbers, brought into Greace, might ferue to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vfing violence; and fecondly. That in any fuch great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vniit 40 man to be employed in the Kings feruice, than was that famous Hamibal the Carthaginian. For he faid, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perifhing under fuch a notable Commaunder if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner qualitie : whereas neverthelesse if Hamibal prenailed: Hamibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antisches. In this regard he was of opinion, That fuch a renowned Warriour should becalwayes neare vnto the Kings person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good fucceffe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the four aigne Command; even of the King himfelfe. Antiethus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being icalous of the vertue, that this ned brighter than the Maicflie of his owne fortune. And thereupon hee laid affide the determination; which tended more to the advancement of his defires, than did any thing elfe by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently after this He made readie for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuo-lous pomp of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-fide to Ilium; there to do facrifice to Minerus of Troy. Thence paffing ouer the Egean Sea, Hee came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whome the Etolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wanne Demetrias; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. Hee therefore with his Countrimen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a figne of good lucke, to bee fo entertained at the beginning. Butit may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie somewhat like to that

10 of Xerxes: they faw three hundred thips, of which no more than fortic were feruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of tenne thousand Foot, fine hundred Horse, and fixe Elephants. The Atolians no fooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore wel onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Etolians gaue him as joyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein hee defired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he faid, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that hee staid not to 20 make all things readie; but hasted vnto their aid, euen whilest the season was vnst for nauigation. Yet it should not bee long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be fatisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armics, and all the Sca-coast with his Fleets. Neyther would hee spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which hee had vindertaken: euen to drive the Romans and their authoritic out of Greece; leaving the Countrie free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be veriegreat: so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not bee any way burdensome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, ha-

uing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aid, vnprouided of manie necessaries; that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof hee stood in need. So he left them to their confultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little difpute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romas and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yelld vnto the Kings defire, and affilt him with all their forces. Here we may observe, how vaineathing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a builnesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell : the Atolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of fuch gaine that might have deceived them; were like to haucabandoned this King their friend, vnto the differetion of the Romans. And what remedie had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himselfe to Theas, and complained of the wrong: but he must have bin contented with this answere, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thosa would therefore have pronounced to bee verie wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Etolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute to where they should beginne the Warre. Chaleis was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture need to vie much force. The King had brought with him into Liolis but a thoufand Foot; leaving the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these hee hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Atolians,

The chiefe Citie of Enbura being thus gotten; all the rest of the Iland shortly veelded to Antiochus. Foure or fine hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer late to have defended Chaleis, repoled themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Barotia, lying ouer against the Hand; where was a Temple and Groue, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priviledge of an inusolable Sanctuarie. In this place were fome 10 of them walking, and beholding the things there to bee seene, whilest others were busied as they found cause: without seare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Memppus, one of Antiochus his Captaines, that had wearied himfelfe in manie vaine. Treaties of peace; tooke advantage of their carelessenesse, and seed them with all extremitie of warre. Verie few of them escaped: fiftie were tak in; and the rest flaine. Hereat Quintus was grieved; yet so, as it pleafed him well to confider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make warre voon the King.

Antiochus liked wel these beginnings, and sent Embassadours into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation thould perfuade very many to take his part. 40 The wifer fort returned such answere, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referued themselves vntill bee should come among them: knowing that eyther, if hee came not. Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joyned with him in true meaning; faue the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Atolians, and now feared the Acheans, Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Acheansto his partie. Neuertheleffe hee affayed them, youn avaine hope that the enuic, which Tetus was faid to beare vnto Philopamen vertue, had bred a fecret diflike betweene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Atolians fent Embassadours to the Councell at Agium; that spared not braue words, if the A-50 cheans would have so been taken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming: reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans and Cadusans; names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydomans, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; fuch indeed as could not be refitted. Now concerning monie, and all warlike furniture: it was, he faid, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwaies thereof great plentie. So as they were much deceiued: who confidering the late war made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the l.ke : the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vtmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Acheans, than that they would hold themselucs as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whileft He tooke order with the Romans. To the 19 same effect spake the Actolian Embassadour : and further added, That in the battel at Cynofcephala, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans or good fouldiours : but that both He and his Armie had beenethere defiroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Actolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue beene delired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embailadour, nor the Aetolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vinto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vant themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discerne, what good correspondence in vanitieit was, that had thus lineked the King and the Aetolians together. For euen such bragges as here they made, be-

20 fore the Acheans who knew them to be liers, had the Aetolians also made vnto king Antiochus: proclayming the victoric ouer Philip to be meerely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimains, and a many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, fuch as were wont to be fold about for bondflaues, and good for little elfe. These diverse names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diversitie of Venison, wherewith a freind of his at Chales (no such vanter as were these Embasfadours) had sometime seasted him. For all that varietie, whereat hee wondred, was none other, as his Host then merily told him ; than so many peeces of one

30 tame swine, drest after severall fashions with varietie of sawces. Setting therefore aside this vanitie of idle pompe : it were good to make judgment of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than ten thousand men about him; for which little Armiche was faine, in a manner, to beg victuailes of the setolians; and take vp monie at vsurie, to defi ay his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie; from Demetrics to Lamia; thence backe to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrics againe. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith fince both Antiochus and the Actolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps alreadie they did, repent, whilest

wafer men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditorie much perswasion is needlesse. The Achaens did not love so well the Aetolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abiects. Wherefore they stood not to harken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubara, or what other Cities were like to take his part : but readily proclaymed war against him, and against the £tolians.

How the hatred betweene thefe two Nations grew inneterate: fufficiently appeares in the storie foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwifely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent spirits of the Liclians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrie at reft; there was nothing more greatly to have beene defired, than that they might never finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to have fought not how Smyrna and Lampfacus might recover their libertie (which had neuer beene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Countrie, as two

Seas by an Ifthmus or necke of land, might be kept from overflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their feeking to make tree those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greekish; than the generaliapplause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lz-Jimsehis, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a verie great cause of feare, that should move them to take armes even in their owne defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, & requested that things might continue as they were, promiting to yntly to affift the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, when socuer King Antiochus should make the least offer to ftirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Ro- 10 man Patronage ouer the Countrie, had been far from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule,

The Achesis were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their freinds and benefactours. All the reft gaue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides : or if fome few, as did the Theffalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bustians willingly received him, as soone as he entered vpon their borders, not so much for searc of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had beene somewhat hardly vied. Aminander the Athamanian, 20 belides his old freindship with the Aetolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Areadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vanted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his filter to the poore Court of Athamania: where having made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Actolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleeue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conqueit of Macedon to his behoofe : fince no man had thereto fo good title 30 as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto ; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that fo they might the fooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswalions of himselfe, or of his sister, esse cted as much as they delired. But the first peece of service done by this imaginarie King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedenians that should be his subjects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochas that employed him) wrought more harme to his freinds, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading : with which he marched vnto Cynofcephale, there to gather vp the bones of the flaughtered Muce lomant; whom their King had fuffered all this while to lie vuburi-ed. The Mecdons troubled not themselues to thinke on this charitable act, asifit were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intended meerely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto rhe Romans; and gaue them to understand, that hee was readic with all his power to aid them wherein focuer they should be pleased to vie him.

The Actolians, Magnetians, Eulowans, Bootians, and Athamanians, having now all loyned with him; Antiochus tooke counfaile of them about the profecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Theffalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring : because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alleadge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long beene castaside, as a vessell of no vie; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vt-

ter, was even the fame which he would have spoken, had his counfaile at any time before beene asked fince their comming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Barotians, and other their good freinds, which now fo willingly tooke their parts : what were they elfe than fo many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare voto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they faw it expedient, be as readie to fall to the contrarie fide, alleadging the same teare for their excuse? wherefore he thought it most behouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie : who (belides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoyle and for fake them at his plea-10 fure) was a mightic Prince, and one that had meanes to fultaine the Roman warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be callly perfuaded to joyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a verie firing Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proning by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, faid Hee , Thefe Letolians here prefent and namely this T HOAS, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motines which be then veed to excite the King unto this Expedition, infilted mainly on the same point, He told us that PHILIP was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordy infoience of the Romans: likening that King to some wild beast, that was channed or lockt up within some grate and would faine breake loofe. If this be foilet wis breake his chrine, and pull downe the grate;

20 that he may regaine bis libertie, and fatisfie his angric flomacke, upon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it proone otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation : then (ball it behous vs to looke unto him, that he may not feeke to please his good mafters the Romans, by offending vs. Your Jonne SELEVEVS is now at Lyfimschis, with part of your Armie: if PHILIP will not hearken to your Embaffage; let SELEVCVs be in readines, to fall upon Mucedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other fide. without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning PHILIP; and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the mannaging of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarqued against the Romans : Itold you my opinion at the beginning. Whereto had you then given eare, the Romans by this time should have heard other newes, than that Chal-

30 cis in Eubwa was become ours. Halie and Giule foould have beene on fire with warre: and, little to their comfort, they flould have under flood, that HANNIBAL was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I fee what should hinder vs even now from taking the fame course. Send for all your Fleete and Armie bother (but in any cafe let Ships of burden come along with them loaden with flore of victuriles: For as the case now stands, we have here too few bands, and too many mouthes.) Whereof let the one halfe be employed against Italie; whilest you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were even readicto follow vs into Italie : yea and be readie to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my

4 aduice : who though perhaps I am not werie skilfull in all forts of warre : yet how to war with the Romans, I have beene inflrusted by long experience, both to their coft and mine owne. Of this counfaile which I give, I promife you my faithfull and diligent feruice for the execution: but what counfaile former you fhall please to follow ; I wish it may bee profeerous . Many were pleafed with the great spirit of the man, and faid he had spoken brauely : but of all this was nothing done; faue onely that one was fent into Asia, to make all things readie there. In the meane while they went in hand with Theffalie; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force; many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Lariffa that was cheife of the Countrie, flood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For OIL Behins, a Roman Proprætor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemie vnto Antiochus : whereby the fame of the fuccour comming to Lariffa grew fuch, as wrought more than the fuccour could have done, had it arrived. For a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had been comming upon him. Therefore exculing himselfe by the time of the yeare; Hee brake up hisseige, and marched away to Chaleis. At Chaleis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeares and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the fouldiors as readily imitated their Captaines: in fuch wife that when he took the feild, he might euidently perceiue in what loofe manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Conful, shall meet him verie shortly, 10 and helpe him to reclaime them from this loofenesse of nuptial Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nafica his Colleague : vnto whom fell a charge, of farre leffe credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had been elong since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome : when the Senate, for verie feare and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught 20 them to call the Mother of the gods. But no prærogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Province; or arrogate more vnto himfelfe, than his lot should affoord him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make war against the Boyans: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with barder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thoufand Horse, and fifteene Elephants. Ptolemie King of £gpt, not with standing his late Alliance with King Antiochus: and Philip King of Macedon; had lately fent Em- 20 balladours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Atolia, there to affift the Conful in this warre. Ptolemic fent also gold and filuer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earneft. But he was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his monie was returned vnto him with thankes; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philips I:mbaffadors answer was made, that this his freindly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him. for the affiftance that He should give to Acilius the Conful. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did striue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promifed a great quantitie of graine; which they 40 would fend partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece . And herein Mafaniffa far out-went the poore Citic of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Conful fine hundered Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vndertooke to fet out a Fleet at their own charges; and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerely pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeem themselues out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous iffue of this war, that began with such noyse and pre-parations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betweene the Roman and the Afiatick fouldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as hee had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe for take him. But King Philip and B.e. bigs, having recovered many places; and the Roman Conful being arrived, again f whom none made relistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good feruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, wastaken by the Conful; made a mocking stocke; and fent away prifoner to Rome. The The flatians vied much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne lives, and departing ynarmed; yet fo, that a thousand of them staied behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochius: who having withdrawne himfelf to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his freinds: and faid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toile during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour : after which, in time of need ; He found all the promites of the Atolians meerely verball: and himfelfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wife man, yea a verie Prophet, that had to refeene all this long before. Neuertheleffe He fent word to the Etolians, that they should now make readie all their forces; as confidering their owne need to be no leffe than his. But the £tolians had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer . Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which iouned with him. Hereat the King was angrie: and could get no better fatisfaction, than that Those and his fellowes had done their best, in vaine, to have made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Alia, nor his friends of Greese would appeare in this time of danger: He feized upon the Streights of Thermopyla: as meaning to defend them against the Rowans, vntill more helpe should 20 come. Of the Streights of Thermopyle there hath beene spoken enough *before, vpon many occasions : and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may casily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into The falie, were vnable to palle that Ledge of Mountaines, dividing the one balfe of Greece: vnleffe they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this pasfage two or three daies together, against a World of men comming to inuade the Countrie. The latter, having taken voon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he lifted himselfe in Greece : did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place, 40 when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilest he lay : He fent earnest messages one after other to the Atolians, entreating them not to forfake him thus: but at least wife now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, left the Romans finding any by-path should come downe vpon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thousand, that vndertooke to make good the few passages; by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was possible for the Enemie to ascend. The Roman Conful in like fort, prepared to force the Streights: without flaying to expect King Philip: that washindered by ficknes from accompanying him . He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaceus, that had both of them beene Confuls. These he sent forth by night so with two thousand men, to trie whether by any meanes they could get up to the Actolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armie : not onely by telling them, with what hafe-conditioned enemies they had to deale; but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore iournic ( for what Mmmmmm 2 happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, faue onely that hee failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocks and crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselves, whilest He, being a vericable man of bodie, tooke in hand the discouerie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path : which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no fuch trouble of climbing : neyther had this en- to trance of the Thermopyla beene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any travailers to fearch out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cate followed, though it were the best: yet dit it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would fuffer him to paffe no further. So he staid there vntill day light: by which he discourred both the Campe of the Greekes underneath him; and some of the Aetolians verie neare vnto him, that were keeping watch. Hee therefore fent fortha lustie Crew of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service; and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby vnderstood, that these Actolians were no more than fix hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set voon the Actolians; over. 20 threw them; flue a great part of them; and chaced the rest: that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was alreadic begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Campe, found it in a maner a desperate peece of worke to affault the Campe it felfe; which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hil-side, and powred downe a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cate his approch determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Atolians had been comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and enfignes were dif- 30 couered, fuch was the terrour, that none made offer of reliftance; but all of them for fooke the Campe, and fled. The flaughter was not great: for that the badnes of the way, did hinder the Roman Armic from making pursuit. Yet this daies loffe draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chaleis; and from thence, with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asa.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon : fetting open their gates; and presenting themselues vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Breisly, in few dayes all was recourred that Intiochus had gained : the £tolians onely franding out, because they knew not what else to doc. Neyther did the Consuleiue 40 them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recourred health came to joyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victorie was alreadie gotten, He did gratulate vnto the Romans their good fucceffe; and offered to take part with them in the Atolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Conful should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would have taken Lamia before the Conful should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedenians that yied to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindred by the flonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen readie to be taken, when the Conful having wonne Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these Townes was are- 50 ward vnto those that had fought at Thermopyle. Herewith Philip must bee contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could foill endure to fee Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victoric, got not Lamia himfelfe: vntill fuch time as another Conful, was readie to ease him of his charge.

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Etolians, that they thought no way fafer than to defire peace. Yet had they fent vnto King Antiochus prefently after his flight:entreating him not to forfake them vtterly, but eyther to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greeces or if any thing with-held him from comming in person, at leastwife to helpe them with monie and other aid. They prayed him to confider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but apportained vnto his owne fafetie: fince it would be much to his light, if the Atolians being wholly fubdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might fet vpon him in Afa. He confidered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He delivered vnto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of monie, that might ferue to defray the charges of the Warre: promiting that ere long he would fend them flrong aid, both by Land and Sea, Thous, another of their Embaffadors, He retained with him: who willingly flaied, that he might viee the King to make his word good. But when Herac'ea was taken from them; then did the Etolians lay afide al hope, of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochuse and made fuit vnto the Conful to obtaine peace, vpon any reafonable Condition. The Conful would fearer vouchfafe to give them audience but faid Hee had other bulineffe in hand : onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and fent L. Valerius Flacers with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would have delivered vnto himfelfe. At their comming to Hypatas they began, as men fauouring their own cause, to alleadge how well they had deferued of the Romans. Whereto Flacess would not hearken. He told them plainly. That the memorie of all fuch good Offices palt, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe fo even betimes, than to flay till they were reduced into termes of more extremitie. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans, and to that effect lent Embaffadours to the Conful. This phrase of committing unto the faith, signified, in their vie of it, little elfe, than the acknowledgment of a fault done, and the crauing of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * yeilding to discretion. Wherefore when the Conful heard them . Legal, excitots foeakein this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to ePolyb.13. their words. They answered that it was ; and she wed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then sayd Hee, I commaund you first of all, That none of yee prefume to goe into Alia, ypon any bulineffe private or publike: then. That wee deliner up vote me Dicearchus the Atolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Ashamanian, and tuch of his Countrimen as have followed him in renolting from vs. Whilest hee was yet speaking : Phame.us the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to militake the Cultome of the Greekes, who n had yeelded themselves unto his faith, not unto flauere. What? (faid the Consul) Doe yee stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto cuerie one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to fay. But Valerius and some others entreated the Conful, not to deale thus hardly with them, fince they came as Embaffadours; though finec. their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apodetior ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill

This furcefance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had beene commaunded away from Lamia, that else he might have wonne. Armie, like one that could not bee truited in employment : especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre; He was delired to fet vpon the Athamanians, and some other pettie Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Atolians; taking for his reward. all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamania, Perrhebia, Ape. rantia, and Dolopia. For the Atolians, hearing what had befalle their Embaffadors. were fo enraged, That although they were very ill prouided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicandera. bout the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with monie and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His monie Nicander conneighed 10 into Lamia, by verice vnu suall dexteritie. But hee himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Atolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was verie much perplexed about this his journie, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the adventure : and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman fide, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians, by whom hee was taken. and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but cyther to bee delinered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemes, that the King had not his therto concocted well the indignitie, of his being fent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his feruants to entreat Nicander friendly: and he himfelfe being then 20 at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose vp: giving him to understand; That the *Etolians did now reape the fruits of their own madneffe; forafmuch as they could neuer hold themselues contented, but would needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleafed themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He faid, high time for them to have regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had never made any triall: for furely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more availeable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselues much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signifie vn- 30 to his Countrimen; and privately to hold in mind the courtesie which hee then did him, in fending him fafe home. So giving him a Convoy to gard him to Hypata; He louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon : fo as in the warre of Perfeus hee made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Conful vnderstood, that the Atolians refused to make their submisfion, in such wife as he required it; he forthwith meant to prosecute the warreagainst them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither he therefore directly marched, to trie what 40 they could or durst. The seige of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceized it: for it was a ftrong Citie, and well manned. But Acilius flood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have been a looser, by rifing from before it without Victorie. So He staid there welneare all the following time of his Confulfhip; whileft the Macedonian King and the Acheans, made farre better vse of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in fuch places as had revolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the firong Citie of Demetrias; and with an haftic course of Victorie, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Acheans called to accompt the Eleans and Meffenians: which had long beene addicted to the Ltolian fide; and followed it, in taking part 52 with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words; whereby they faued themselues from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more flout, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achean Prætor walted their Countrie, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whome they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vato the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre : as also the peremptoric Command of the same Titus caused the Mellenians to annex themselves vnto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Majettie of a Roman Embaffador. Titus did fauour the Acheans; yet could not like it wel, that eyther they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were firong enough to defend it against anic of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon even termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once been Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander who fent a Gouernour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driven out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to fell the Iland to the Acheans; whom he found readie Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victoric which they had obtained. It was bootiesseto dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselues vnto his diferetion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tor-20 toile, whereof Peloponnelus was the ihell : and that holding themselues within that compaffe, they were out of danger; but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they should be open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having setled thinges thus in Peloponnejus , Flee went over to Manpactus : where Glabrio the Confui had laine two monethes, that might have beene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which Hee had voon the Atolians, or out of diflike of King Philips thriving to fast : Hee perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the belieged, and to the whole Nation, follong Truce, that they might fend Embassadoursto Rome; and submitting themselves crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Atolians 30 haue made fuch earnest suit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this sauour. But if Glabrio had beene fure to carrie it, in any short space : it may well be thought hee would not have gone away without it; fince the winning of that Towne, wherin was then the whole floure of the Nation, would have made the promifed submission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome: no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That eyther they should wholly permit themselues to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neyther Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much monie : neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should give themselves a-40 way unto diferetion; which what it fignified, they now understood. Wherefore they defired to have it fet downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeild vnto the good pleafure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answere: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whileft the Leviluss were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Confal had little to doe in Greece; and therefore took yon him grauely to set things in order among the tradable Levisus. Hee would have had them to reflore the banished Lavedamonian; home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleuns into the fellowshippe of their Common-wealth. This the Levisus liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans; should be medling in all occurrence. Wherefore they destruce the restitution of the banished Lavedamonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne merce grace. As for the Eleuns: they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans: into whose Corporation they were destrous to be admitted; and law that they should have their desire, without shad populsion mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Linius, much about the fametime, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and fine and twentie faile of khocians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of faile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidus being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betook himselfe to a speedie retrait.

And fuch end had the first yeares warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Ltolians, were glad to excuse themselves by seare; thinking themselves happie when 10 by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Matedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now fend to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Lemetrius his yonger fonne; whom fome few yeares they had kept as an hoftage. Also King Ptolemie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victoric, lent word how greatly all Afia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee defired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to fend an Armie, as soone as might be, into Afia: promiting, that his affistance, wherein socuer it pleased them to vie it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolemie was the fonne-in-law of King Antiochus : but hee was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of 20 the Contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The fame did Antiochus now beginne to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephelus, as if he had beene in another World but was told by Hanmbal, That it was not so farre out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italie into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would foone be there, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

VIII.

LVCIVS SCIPIO, having with him PVBLIVS the African his elder Brother, for his 30 Lieutenant, is fent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Atolians, that fo he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much trouble some businesse by Sea; and divers fights. An inuasion upon Evmenes his Kingdome; with the fiege of Pergamus, rayled byan handfull of the Acheans. L. Scipio the Conful comes into Afia: where ANTIOCHUS most earnestly desireth peace and is denied it. The battaile of MAGNESIA: wherein ANTIOCHVS being vanquished, yeildeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what fort the Romans weed their Victorie. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO after amost sumptuous triumph over An-TIOCHVS, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stilled The African.

VCIVS CORNELIUS SCIPIO, the brother of P. Scipio the African was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lelius. Lelius was veric gracious in the Senate: and therefore being detirous (as generally all Confuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be sopleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approued well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time beene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise 50 fomewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African faid openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Leiutenant. These words were heard with fuch approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relyed upon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had beene victorious against the same Great Worthie. But indeed a worser man might have serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in confultation, where his wildome was much approved, but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthic of remembrance; as a figne of the freedome that he yfed in his cenfures, even whileft he lived in fuch a Court. Antiochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may feeme, to have made him with, that hee had beene fer-10 ued by fuch braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horfes, and Elephants, with fuch coftly furniture of Gold, Siluer, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauerie on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleafing himfelfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what hee thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans, Enough (faid Hannibal) were the Romans the most couetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backs of Cowardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this answere pleased the King; it is calle to ghesse. The little vse that hee made of this Carthaginian, tellifies that his diflike of the man, caused him to loofe the vie of his feruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof. The Scipio's made all haft away from Rome as foone as they could. They carried with them, befides other Souldiors newly preft to the warre, about fine thousand Voluntaries, that had ferued under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirtie Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. A. mylius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeare for that Voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Conful Glabrio belieging Amphilla a Citie of the Ltolians. The Ltolians after that they were denied peace, had expeeted him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the paffages thereto leading; which heedleffely, as in a time of confution, they had left vngarded the last yeare. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their 30 expectation, and fel vpon Lamia: which being not long fince much weakned by Philip, and now by him attempted on the fudden; was carried at the fecond alfault. Thence went Hee to Amphiffa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his fucceffor, came with thirteene thousand Foot and fine hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the inhabitants: but they had a Caftle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; where-halfe of the Lieliums: entreating him to fland their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and wil-4º led them to perswade the Etolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning delire it. This was gladly taken. But many meflages paffing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conful made fill the fame answere, with which they had beene chaced from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre: whereby at more leifurethey might attend some better disposition of the Senate, or any helpeful commoditie which time should affoord. So they obtained halfe a yeares Truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeares leifure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loft which with held the Warre from palling ouer into Afix.

into they all retired. The Athenian Embaffadours had dealt with P. Scipio, in be-

The busines of detolia being thus laid aside : and the old Conful Glabrio sent no home into Italie: the Scipio's marched into Theffalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace vnto the Hellespont. Yet they considred, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyaltic of King Philp: who might either doc them some mischeife by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notableaduantage: or at the least, would be be vnfaithfull, though he were not so couragious; yet might he take fuch order with the Thracians, that even for want of victualles, it by no greater inconvenience, they should be difgracefully forced to returne. He had promifed them the vtmoft of his furtherance : wherein, whether he meant fincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as hee should take him on the sudden. The King was merricat a feaft, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly bad welcom; and shewed him the next day, not onely what prouision of victuailes he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges over the riuers, and mended the bad waies by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracehus returned backe in hast vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, 10 found all things in a readines, that might helpe to advance their journie. The King entertayned them royally; and brought them on their way, even to the Hellespont: where they stated agood while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance, Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochius, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and defirous of reuenge vpon his Countrimen that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe fomwhat vpon those that were fo carly in their diligence, before their fellows should arrive to helpe them . Yet 20 went he craftily to worke; and fent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleived : and the Rhodian Admiral grew so carelesse, expecting stil when he should receive a watchword from Polyxenidas, that he himlelfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauen. The Kings Flect fetting forth from Ephelus by night, and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readie to enter the Hauen. Pauliflratus the Rhodian Admirall leeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow hismen on the two head-landsor points of the Hauen; foto gard the mouth of it: 30 for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidae had alreadie landed some companies, in another part of the lland : which falling vpon the backe of Pau/istratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and funke or boorded all his Nauie, fine excepted, that by a fudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles, at the Beake-head: and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemie: who having not bethought himfelfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to give way vnto these desperate Gallies; for feare left they should burne, together with themselves, a part of the Kings 40

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polysenidas could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpole, He was driven backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great brauerie, presented battaile to Polyxenidas before the Hauen of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as eyther they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet perfourmed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

and Pergamus: and leaving his fonne Seleucus to be feige the royali Citic of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Armie spoile the whole Countrie thereabout. Attaius, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore bee had reason to fland in feare; being too much inferiour in number. There came to his aid a thoufand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achaens: old souldiors all, and trayned vp under Philopamen; whose scholler, in the Art of war, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemie; began to disdaine, that such men as they 10 should hold him besieged. For Seleneus his Armie which was encamped at the hillfoot, seeing that none durst sallie forth vpon them, grew so carelesse: as otherwise, than by spoyling all behind their backes, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told him that hee would goe forth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he said, that the match was nothing equall. But the Achean would needes have his will: and iffuing forth, encamped not far from the Enemie. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the beseigers; they wondred at first what his meaning was: but when they faw that he held himfelfe quiet, they made a lett of his boldnes; and laughed to fee with what an handfull of men he looked fo flout-30 ly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and diforders. Which Diephanes perceiuing, Hee commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they wel might; and he himselfe, with the hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Verie few of the enemies had their Horses readic sadled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as Hee draue them all out of their Campe; and chaced them as far as hee might fafely aduenture, with great flaughter of them, and no loffe of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had concred the wals of the Towne, men and women, to beholde this spectacle) were veric toyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Acheans. Yet would they not therfore iffue forth of their gates, to helpe the Ache-30 ans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than hee had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested awhile in his old Station. When they had staid many houres, looking who should begin: Seleneus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moued not whilest the Enemie was in sight; but as soone as the ground between them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all hast, & soone overtaking them with his Horse charged them in Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their verie Trenches. This boldnes of the Acheans, and the basenes of his owne men, caused Selencus to quit the seige, little to his 40 honour. Such being the qualitie of these Afiatiques; Philopamen had cause to tell the Romans, That he enuied their victoric. For when Antiochus lay fealting at Chaleis after his marriage, and his fouldiors betooke themselves to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great fecuritie: a good man of war might hauc cut all their throtes, euen as they were tipling in their victualing houses; which Philopamen said that hee would haue done, had He bin General of the Achean, & not, as he then was, a private man. Antiochus was full of busines : and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before bath to beene shewed, and went to Elea: whither hee heard that Emylius the Roman Admirall was come, to bring fuccour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace : about which to confult, Eumenes was sent for by Emylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was confidered, that no conclusion could be made without the Conful; this Treatic brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the leige of Pergamus. Atterwards, foure or fine Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of feuen and thirtie Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce : for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus. was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could docto Apollonius; and having the victorie taken out of his hand by Afolionius his flight. yet made such a retrait, that the Rhodians durst not farre aductive vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Præfaces vnto the war; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The bat- to taile was fought by Myonne/us a Promontoric in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and fine of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the firength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanitie of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus vanted the latt yeare, That his Armaia should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies , the Rhodims, two and twentie: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timberd and thin planckt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sca-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselves by the same deuice; with which, fine of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemie: who declining them for feare, laid 20 open his fide; and was thereby ingreater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted faile: and having a faire wind, bore away toward Ephefus as falt as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behind them: wherof thirteeene were taken : all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows lost onely two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masteric of the Sea.

The report of this miladuenture, may feeme to have taken from Antiochus all vle of reason. For assi no hope had beene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: Hee presently with Arew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might eatily have beene kept, even till the end of Winter following, and have reduced the beseigners (if the liege had beene continued obttinately) to termes of 30 great extremitie. Hee allo gave over the sleg of Celophen: and laying asside all thought save onely of desence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Conful, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellefpont; but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe fide. The Fleet was then also in readines, to transport him ouer into Alia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that He landed quietly at his owne good case; euen as if the Countrie had beene his alreadic. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him 40 from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perfivade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampfacus, and Lyfmachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seing therefore the King had now alreadie given over Ly machia; and was further purposed, not to strine with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with war? If it was their defire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asa, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands : the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein . Breifly, let them take fome part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be 50 uncertaine; and it should be quietly put into their hands. It all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, whereat they had beene in this war. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too infolent vpon confidence of their fortune; Hee expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were indged by the Romans to be veric little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his only fault : and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which he held in Aolis and lonia; but quite out of Asia the leffe, and keepe himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore saw, that no better bargaine could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him hee promised agreat quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by 10 the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his fonne, than vpon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publicke busines: Hee onely faid thus much, That fince Antiochies had alreadie for laken Lyfimachia, and fuffered the war to takehold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, faid He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Conful demanded of him no leffe, than if he had beene alreadic fubdued: little reason 20 there was, that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could loose, as hee thought, no more, than by feeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him threefcore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was hee nothing pleased, to heare that the Conful drew neare him apace, as one hastning to fight. But how foeuer he was affected; Hee made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ficke at Elea, He fent thither vnto him his fonne without ranfome: as one both defirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his ficknes, and withall not defirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne fafetie. Thus ought his boun-30 tie to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein he dealt craftily. For fince he could have none other ranfome of Scipio, than fuch as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtelie before the battell, as would afterwards have beene little worth; than to flay untill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recourrie of his fonne: fo as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue beene much availeable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, He faid onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, Iam now able to make your King none other amends, than by adulfing him not to fight, ontill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to conie-40 fture. Antiochus resolued to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thratira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, He fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. This ther followed him L. Scipio the Conful; and fate downe within four emiles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slue some; and were anon, with some losse driven backe over the River. Two daies were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the aduenture: wherein they found no diffurbance; nor were at all opposed, vntil they came within two miles and an halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were 50 taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand, Horse and Foote: whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure daies together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies ; and let them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Con-fultooke aduife what was to be done. For either they null fight vpon what foeuer difaduantage, or elfer folue to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrie of their freinds, and therefore (which two many difficulties: valefle they would flaine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more conucnient place; and fo deferre the war vntill the next Spring. The Roman fouldrour was throughly perfivaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, that this great Armie should be assailed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouring the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set you shim. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherfore the King, being loath to discouring the shim then, by seeming to land in seare of the Enemie; resoluted to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battailes: Healso did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might vndersland his meaning to she the.

The Roman Armie confifte of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vivally, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were divided into Maniples. The Haftate had the leading : after them followed the Principes, at fuch distance as was viuall; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three the usand Auxiliaries; partly 20 Acheans; and partly fuch as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vtmost of all (faue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Tralians were almost three thousand Horse : of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the river : yet foure Troups of horse were placed there; though fuch helpe feemed in a manner needleffe. Two thouland Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conful had with him fixeteene African Elephants, which hee bestowed in his Rere: for a funch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men, as being fure to be beaten, the Indian being farre the greater, and more 30 couragious beafts: whereof Antiochus had likewife much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diverfly apointed, and not all accultomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the feuerall kinds, in such wise as each might be of most vsc. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These Hee placed in the middest, and divided into tenne Battalions: every one haning two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beafts, and fuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Crefts, Towers on their backes, and befides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in cuerie Tower, made agallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these 40 were fifteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse and Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agenta, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, divided in their severall kinds, doe seeme to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have beene firetched out in Front. Adjoyning to these were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment : called the Argyraspides or Silversbields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like fo valiant as those of the same name, that had serued under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archerson horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foote, two thousand and five 50 hundred Archers of Mylia; with foure thousand flingers and Archers of the Cirtzans, and Elymaans. On the left-hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were fent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seuen hundred of divers

Nations; and a Regiment of a thou sand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troupe, being, Syrians, Phryzians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaris, where on sate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Ciliaians, Paphylians, Pytraans, Elymaans, and many others, hauing also with them sixteene Elephants. Antiobus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleuans in the left and three of his principall Captaines commanded over the Phalameier.

The first onset was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot, Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eafily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with showtings, and noyfes, and fome wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged voon the left wing : where they found no relistance ; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearle, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible : that the Phalangiers, with such varietie of Auxi-20 liaries, made little or no relistance; but all of them fled, in manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flancked with Horse; gaue vpon them couragiously, and forced them to retire. But M. Amylius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, iffued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renewe the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were alreadie victorious: whereof when Antiochus discouered the approch; He not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away upon the spur without further tariance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a 30 great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is faid to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not flaine aboue three hundred Foot, and foure and twentie Horse: of Eumenes his followers fluc and twentic.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodic of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Townesmen and Souldiors were fo difmaved with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded vp themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on the way. Neyther were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother : who obtained leave to make the answere, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done; which was, That hee should quite abandon his Dominions on this fide of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fifteene thousand Talents: fine hundred in hand; two thousand and fine hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelve thousand, in twelve yeares next ensuing by even portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some flore 50 of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, verie earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Atolian, with force others who had flirred up the King to this warre, delivered into their hands. But any wife man might fo eafily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demaunds; as no great Nnnnnn 2 art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commillion, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to doc, than to fend immediatly to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Confuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and Cn. Manlius Volfo. The Etolians defired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neyther of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Confuls should make Warre vpon the Liolians. the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes, that Antiochus was alreadie vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands; yet fince the State of Asia was not like to bee 10 fo throughly fetled by one Victorie, but that many thinges might fall out worthic of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whome Aia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others : yea by King Eumenes in person ; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his owne deferts : and comparing himselfe with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, 20 fince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Mafanissa was onely such in title; and fince both he and his father had alwayes beene their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what he would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craued that they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countrie by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpole to keepe in their ownehands. Neyther thought hee it needfull, that they should trouble themfelues with the care of giving libertie to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Afia fide. For fince the most of those Townes had beene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The 20 Rhodians did not like of this. They defired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian libertic; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had beene fubicct vnto Philip, and ferued him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they inlifted, was this, That the Victorie of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as eafily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifully gaucaway so much, that every one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus : after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe 40 whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of anic ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had beene given vnto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Afiatick: which the fortune of his Victoric had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallogreekes, vanquished by the Roman Consuls FULVIVS and MANLIVS. MANLIVS hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other obiections) with attempting to have paffed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by SIBYLL. Of SIBYL'S Prophecies; the Bookes of HER-MES; and that Inscription, SIMONI DEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio Es: and the leginning of faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

tweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now ftyled Afiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one m ins worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had graunted fo long a Truce to the Atolians. But fince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtic little Nation had not fought to humble it felfe to the Roman Maiestie, it was now to be brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Atolians. They had forescene the danger, when their Em-20 balfadours were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become interceffours for them . Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuife, vpon helping themselves, even by repurchase of Countries loft, where they spied aduantage.

Poore King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Callles. But the Athamanians (besides that manic of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) having beene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conversed with them after an homelie manner; could not endure the proud and infelent manner of commaund, vfed by 30 the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their feruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which undertooke the worke. Yet affurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to tric his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand £10lians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers, having divided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countrie, to his vie. The fame of this good fucceffe at first; with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action : made the Lieutenants of 40 Philip vnable to thinke vpon relifiance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few daies; giving thereby some leifure vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his belt, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lo . Philip had brought from home fix thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all faue two thousand behind him & so came to Athenaum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theum a while, to take a placelying over Argithea, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither be, nor the King, had the boldnesse to descend upon Argithea; for that they might perceive the Athamanians, 50 all along the hill fides, readie to come downe vpon them, when they should be bufie. Wherefore nothing was thought-more honourable than a fafe retreat: specially when Aminander came in light with his thouland . Atolians. The Macedonians were called back from wards Argithea, and prefently with drawne by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not fuffered to depart in quiet, at their pleasure.

CHAP.5. S.9.

The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layed them, and purfued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine slight, with great loss of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, until Philip his returne.

The *Etolians*, having found the businesse of *Athamania* so easie, made attempt, in their owne behalfe, you the *Amphilochians* and *Aperantians*. These had belonged who their Nation, and were lately taken by *Philip*; from whom they diligently revolted, and became *Etolian againe. The *Dolopians* lay nexts; that had been euer belonging to the *Macedonian*, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbours readic to fight 12 with them in the *Atolian* quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the iou was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consult his hasting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that he had recovered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his loss: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluits went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had beene the chiefe feat of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. 20 With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Etolians: yet could not by them be relieued, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vpon equall ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Etolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and readic to be driven from their new conquest, by Perfess the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with fo many at once; and therefore as earnestly fought peace with the Romans, as they floutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who befought the Consult to graunt them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any vio- 20 lence of the affavlants, or danger that might feeme to threaten. The Confull had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so be driven to leave vnto his fucceffor the honour of finishing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bad them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchale. He also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his feruice as a mediatour, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnsusferable. The same Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodians accom- 40 panied those of the Liolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this interceffion, for that Philip had made verie grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the maiestic of the people of Rome, and to observe divers articles, which made them lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having beene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrie. The Isle of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselues (as not long since 50 they had gotten Zacynthus from the Acheans, by (tiffely preffing their owne right) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to forbcare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was fet downe an Order fo perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Iudges of the controuerfies, when they should arife. And hereof good vse will be shortly made: when want of emploiment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordlie Inquisition to be held, upon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Conful, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallogreekes and others. His Armie was the fame that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the consummation. Hee visited those Countries on the hither fide of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some pettle Lords, or Tyrants, to some free Cities, and some that were together at warres, without regard of the great alteration hapned in Asa. From every of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which heeshould else haue wanted an errand. He was euen loaden with bootie, when, haning fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallogreekes. These had long dominiered ouer the Countrie: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terrour of their forepassed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they served vnder King Antiochus, as made them to know themselues farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon to the Riuer Halys, in an Inland Countrie, where those enemies were not like to fearch them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the reft to yeeld: then was no counfaile thought fo good, as to forfake their houses and Countrie, and, with all that they could carrie or drive, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympia and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and vichuailed for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promifed greatest affurance : it was thought, that the Conful would either for beare the attempt of forcing them, or eafily be repelled; and that finally, o when he had staied there awhile, winter, and much want, should force him to diflodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallogreekes had beene careleffe of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if the stones would have served well enough to that purpose : the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in difaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did calily prevaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallogreekes, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive armes, could not hold out against the arrowes and 40 weapons of the Roman light armature : but were driven from a peece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselues headlong downs the steepe rockes. Few of the menescaped aline: all their wines, children, and goods, became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation ouercome soone after, at the other mountaine : onely more of them faued themselves by flight, as having fairer way at their backes.

The fewartes being ended: Fulaius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, cach of them to retaines a Proconful his Province for another yeare. Fulsius, in his 50 fecond yeare, did little or nothing. Manlius gane peace to those whom hee had vanquilhed; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocium, and some others, not by him vanquilhed, but submitting themselves for leare of the Roman armes. Hee drew from them all what profit he could: and laid yoon them such conditions, as hee thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto

CHAP.5. S.9.

he fwore, and received the Kings oath by Embaffadours, whom hee fent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellefbont, loaden with spoile, as carrying with him (belides other treasures) all that the Gallogreekes had in fo many yeares extorted, from the wealthic Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returns home. rich in money alone, or cattaile, or things of needfull vie, which the Roman fouldier had beene wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous houlhold-stuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Mulitians for banquets, and, in a word, with the feedes of that luxuric, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrie of Thrace lay betweene Hellespont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journie homeward. L. Sapio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any fuch bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with an huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not fo well containe themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than verie pleafantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angrie; seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gave the Romans 20 to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Alia: whereas contrariwife, Antiochus had offered vnto himfelfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Atolians; promifing moreover to reflore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betweene him and Eumenes, when the warre began : he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victorie, to give away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonnels and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they beflowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. 30 He had entertained louingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neare acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wanne from Antiochie : as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates affilting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore faw these vpstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced to highly, and made greater than himfelfe yea himfelfe vnregar- 40 ded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that hee had joined with Antiochies and the Atolians, by whom he might have beene freed from his infolent masters. But what great argument of such discontented nesset the Micedonian had, we shall verie shortly be viged to discourse more at large. At the present it was belocued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to affaile the Romans palling through their Countrie. They knew all advantages: and they fell, vnexpected, upon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had alreadie paffed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet fo farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to 50 leave behinde: though both the getting, and the fauing did cost many lives as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought untill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though leffe dangerous, before the Armic could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and to to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fuluius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction : especially to Manlim; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to affist him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vinworthic Commander. Touching the relt of their acculation; it sufficeth that he made good answere, and was approued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthie of more particular confideration. Reprehending his delire to have hindred the peace with Antiochus; they said, That with much adoe he was kept Lindas

10 from leading his Armie ouer T AVRVS, and adventuring upon the calamitie threatned by SYBYLS verses, unto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamitic or onerthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Luculus had opened vnto him the way, and had before hand wonne, in a fort, the Countries on the other fide of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out neare about 20 one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Egrpt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to have had reference, vnto the fame things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Agyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Siby/had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, fowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take Tullide Dinin. root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more proba- 12. ble, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should have any way betokened the comming of our Saujour : as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers, have beene well pleased to interprete Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the sibylline prædictions I have sometimes thought reverend-20 lie: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But observation of the shamefull Idolatrie, that vpon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well prevailed vpon my credulitie, and made mee suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of master Cafauben upon the Annales of Cardinall Barenius, did altogether Isaac Cafaub. worke or matter Cajanoon vpon the Zinnaies of Caldinan Business, Gid altogether Exercial. 1. free me from mine errour; making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of ad Annal. Bar Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was foreshewed, but even the bookes of Hermes, n. 10. 611. which have borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited peeces, and at first entertained (whosoeuer deuised them) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as 40 delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthned with forreine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus Euseb, Ecclbift. in Rome; namely of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription Simoni Deo Sancto, 1.2.6.13. that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should have beene quite omitted by Tacisus, by Suetonius, by Dien, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets

50 that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancio, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of SEMONI SANGO: a title foure hundred yeares older than the time of Simon Migus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebell, had many ages before beene confecrated SEMONI SANGO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi god Sangus, in whose Chapell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Senece, who then lived and flour flied, would have abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so samous. Wherefore I am perswaded, letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vponthem; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be missered, Sinonisant Sancto, and that some of the simple who had heard of Simon Mague, but not of Sangue, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such consectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more historicall, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane over-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten posse.

The fift Booke of the first part

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a 10 few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last paiment of those monies, which the Common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the second Punicke warre. Solong was it, that Rome had fill some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memoric, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even as long as he well could: for that he thought it not fafe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called, one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the People; men, only by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that 20 fuch vnworthie men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasurie, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrie. When therefore his day of answere came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assemblie, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the People, That vpon the fame day of the yeare he had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre by a fignall victorie. In memorie whereof, hee thought it no fit scason to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there give thankes to Jupiter and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at 30 other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weightie businesse of the Common wealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever fince the seventeenth yeare of his life, untill he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deferts had exceeded the great neffe of those honourable places, then would they pray that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might fill be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, cuen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipie; leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne flaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, vntill for verice shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, 40 unrequested, a surther day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their fuit, but enforce him to fubmit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to vindergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeares he lived, or whether he lived one whole yeare, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeare, with Hannibal and Philopamen, as also of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he outlined the Tribunelhip of his accusers; who meant to have drawne him backe to his answere, if one of their Colleagues (as one 50 of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoeuerit was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipiothe Asiatique. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching monie receiued of Antiochue, and not brought into the common Treasurie; That the Senate should give charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and indicially determine, thereof. In fauour of this Decree an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and initigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue: temperate, valiant, and of fingular indultrie; frugall alfo, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was even faultic: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vn mercifull and vn conscionable, in seeking to encrease his owne wealth, by such meanes as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poyloned with enuic, troubled both himfelfe, and the whole Citie, whileft he lived. His meane birth caufed him to 10 hate the Nobilitie; especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their adnancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabria, whose Lieutenant he had beene at Thermopyla, was his Competitor for the Cenforship. and likely to carrie it, he tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periurie, That he had not brought into the common Treasurie fome veffels of gold and filter, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus, Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipioes grew partly (belides his generall fpight at the Nobilitie) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was given vnto 20 himfelfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did vtter his diflike of the Confuls bad husbandrie (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptoric manner; Scipio plainely told him. That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipioes, whileft it was nourished by their enemie, brake out vpon advantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuere inquirie and 30 judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soone condemned in a summe of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie should have been layed up in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracebus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his having beene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had beene against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and clients made fuch a collection for him, as would have fet him in better o estate than before, if he had accepted it. He tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessarie vse, being redeemed for him by his necress friends.

And thus began the citille warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, wntill now, fince the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and fome want of fufficient employment, were efpeciall helpes to the kindling of this fire, which first caught hold vpon that great Worthie, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great securitie her extreame danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contains themselues within heat of wordes, and cunning practife, For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarressome businesses, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubbes and stones, afterward with swords; and similty, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lade of rare vertue, that in honour of her two soness was more commonly named Mother of the

Gracchi, faw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Confuls all the whole power of the Citic, vnder this forme, Let the Confuls prouide, that the Commonweale receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to have woon a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracehus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by fuch authoritie they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was 10 so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senatours: whereupon began the civile warres; which giving vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cafar, a man of higher foirit, to affect and obtaine the like foueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was proposed. It is true, that never any Confull had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in paffing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citic stand in need of a Soueraigne Lord: fo the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemics those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voices 20 in the House, did compell Casar, or give him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith prevailing against his adversaries, he tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by inteftine discord, the Romans confurning all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subjects vnto the arbitrarie government of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their infolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe even what they lifted. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto ynto compleat greatnesse. nor beleeued of her felfe as if she had, whilest a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. 30 Wherefore this confummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the fequele will discouer.

CHAP. VI. The second Macedonian Warre.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the 40 Romans, when the warre with ANTIOCHVS was finished. The Romans quarrell with PHILIP. They deale insolently with the Achaans. The Macedonian, being unreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his some DEMETRIVS; of whom thence-

FIER the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts : yet in veric 50 truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vasfalls to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whome focuer it rest; namely, To make Lawes; To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beste Mome; and To reserve (as the French call it) le dermier resort, or the last appeales, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeale, or last refort, as eueric pettic injuric offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadours, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senatours themselues within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Gommonweales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Effates and R egalities vtterto ly dissolued. Neuerthelesse it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interpoled their will to the contrarie; neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the severall Estates of Greece did bow verie gently: either as being thankefull for their deliuerance from a yoke more femily grieuous, or, as being skilfull in the art of flatterie, and therein taking delight, fince therein confifted their chiefe hope of thrining; or, as being more fearefull of difpleasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living 20 further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, queftioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to vie his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little availeable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not throughly subdued. For youn the same reason (as well as youn his owne high deferts) were they verie louing vnto Masanissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion setled in Afrike: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subjection vnto themselves, by the ministeric of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vsefull 30 and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But fuch magnanimitie was noneotherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their Estate, and a valuation of himfelfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that hee had lately given passage to their Armies through his Countrie, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellespont into Alia; against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Anus and Maronea, with all Pecces and Places demaunded by any of his neighbours; whereof manie of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themfelnes.

These Townes of Anus and Maronea had beene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion verie farre. He is thought to have made himselfe Lord of Tran/yluania: in which Province it is faid, * That innumerable Medals of gold have been found, in the Hift: of Hungaage of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped vie by Mari with his Image on the one fide, on the other fide with Victorie. Of all these Lord-50 ships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lined not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleneus Wicator by right of warre, wherein he vanquished and flue Lysimachus: as alfo, by the like right, Ptolomie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not fusianc, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crowne, 000000 together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his fuccessours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recoursed their libertie; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to finde their advantages and make vie of them, even vpon Macedon. Against the mischieses commonly done by these, King Philip did prouide the most convenient remedies: by shutting vo the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lylimachia, with some other Townes in Ibrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of 10 his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate : yet for a smuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Atolians, of wrongfull viurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia, Hereto he made a good answere, That his Garrison did onely faue it from the Thracians: who, as foone as hee thence withdrew his men, did feize vpon the Towne. and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have faid, touching Anus and Marones; That they were Places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarims might have entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not anayled him, 20 in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title, fince Antiochus had gotten all the Countrie thereabout, whileft Philip was bufied in his former warre; and fince they, by their victorie had gotten vnto themselues all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Enus and Maronea should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed voon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonness, that were alreadie his by their gift. What they would determine, he might ealily perceive, by the demeanour of their Embaffadors towards him: who fitting as Judges betweene him and all that 20 made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in cuerie controuersie. Neuerthelesse, he sent Embassadoursto Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes, wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might prevaile) was wholly on his fide. For he had holpen their Confuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Atolians: wherein what soeuer he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embalfadours: and would they now depriue him of those two Townes,lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By fuch allegations either hee was likely to preuaile, or at leastwife to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to 40 doc. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embassadours. Wherefore, considering how infolently the Maranites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their libertie, he tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea coasts, to handle these Maronites in such fort, as they might have little joy of the libertie by them fo earnestly desired. Onomassus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might facke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadours, who had better notice, than could have beene 50 feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more firicily, than became his Majestie, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himselfe, and layed it even upon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable

to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throtes. And hereof hee willed the Embaffadours to inquire, among the Maronites themselues: as well knowing, that they who survived were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not vtter an offensive word. But hee found the Romans more seucre, and more throughly informed in the bulinesse, than to rest contented with such an answere. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must lend Onomastius and Cassander to Rome, thereto be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble 10 him. Yethe collected his spirits, and said that Cassander should be at their dispofition : but concerning Onomastus, who had not beene at Maronea, nor neare to it, hee requested them not to presse him; fince it stood not with his honour, so lightly to give away his friends. As for Caffander, because he should tell no tales; hee tooke order to have him poisoned by the way. By this wee see, That the doêtrine, which Machiauel taught vnto Cafar Borgia, To employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne inuention. All ages have given vs examples of this goodlie pollicie, the latter having beene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient : as the reigne of Henrie the eighth here in England, can beare good witneffe; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleafant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought vpon him the warre which hee feared, before hee was readie to entertaine it. Wherefore hee emploied his younger fonne Demetrius as Embaffadour vnto the Senate : giuing him instructions, how to make answere to all complaints ; and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in fuch wife that if ought were amiffe, yet might it appeare that hee had beene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacific the Romans, and make all cuen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be verie acceptable vnto the 30 Senate 3as having beene well approved by them, when he was hoftage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likelie, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likelie to divert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had beene Judges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrie. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the compleint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Acheans. It was objected vnto the Acheo ans, That they had committed a grieuous flaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedemon: That vnto this crueltie they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycort.w, then Prætor of the Acheans, made answere, That these banished Lacedamonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to be the men, who had themselues committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame vpon others: the Acheans having onely called those vnto judgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes having flaine them, vpon private, though inft hatred, as they were comming to make an lwere for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedamen, hee faid it was most agreeable to Lycurque his ordinance: who, having perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibite vnto them all kindes of fortifications; as the

Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Viurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walles, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lyeurgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Luedamonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countrimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answere and give account of their actions; as vasfals 10 and flaues vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Acheans as well require to be fatisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busic themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon? For if the Romans would fland upon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratific it : then must the Achaans have recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without periurie could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing, the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycortas, Appius found little to replie. Yet taking flate vpon him, hee pronounced more like a Mafter than a 20 Iudge, That if the Acheans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and carne thankes whileft they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Acheans; which ground to heare the Lordly words of Appies. Yet Feare prevailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they lifted. Hereupon the Embaffadours reftored fome banished and condemned men : but the Roman Senate, verie soone after, did make void all Judgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Acheans upon any Citizen of Lacedamon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territoric of Lacedamon, should be suffered to continue a member of 20 the Achean Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made, as it had beene, an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend your their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the love which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had over

Into fuch flauerie had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-weales whatfocuer, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their fuccour. They wanted not the good counfaile and per- 40 fwalions of many wife and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gaules, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by feeking Patronage, made meere vaffals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect; yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so prevaile with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of felfe ruine, be ought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearfull scruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes verie farre from during to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in 50 awe; yet was hee not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Remons by freeing from his subjection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrie would be his, when focuer he should take armes as short-lie he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the delired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie foone following. He had beene louingly vied at Rome, and heard with great fanour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, vnskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make anfwere: it was permitted vnto him, to reade fuch briefe notes as hee had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne fake, as they then faid and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreatie of his fonne, together with fome infolence of his fonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a lealousse of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome; some bringing one commandement; fome another; and fome, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had been imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance; and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that hee had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needs must. With these Embaffadours young Demetrius was converfant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and o for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleafing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perfess, the elder fonne of the King, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perfew, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere wee proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this icalousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

ò. I I.

The death of PHILOPOEMEN, HANNIBAL, and Scipio. That the militarie profession is of all other the most unhappie : notwithstanding some examples, which may feeme to produe the contrarie.

He Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Acheans; that they feemed not valikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achean Common-wealth, having long beene of a contrarie Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselues from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, seuered from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerfull in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-ftrongly affected in the bufineffe; were carefull to feeke occasion of reducing things to fuch passe, that altheir Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to doe fome acts of hostilitic; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee 50 drawne, and either fide to farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopamen, then Pretor of the Acheans, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Megalopoli:ans, were foone in a readinesse to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for O00000 3

the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, hee met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Mellenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilest his horsemen were too earnest in following the chace; there arrived, by chance, a supplie of five hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopamens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopamen himselfe had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had fo willingly aduentured themselues under his conduct. He tooke upon him to 10 make the Retrait: and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrific from approaching over-neare to him. But it fell out vnhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his horse, and being withall in very weake plight of bodie, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Encmies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeued their fortune to bee so good, although their eies were witneffes. The first messenger that brought these newes to Meffene, was so farre from being beleeved, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They 20 caused him to be brought into the Theater, that therethey might satisfie themfelues with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the fingular benefits by him done vito them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life : because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leave any differace, or injurie, done to him, vnreuenged. They durft not one trust another with the keeping of him : but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had beene made for the custodie of their T reasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine 30 laid an heavie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not staied long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poison, which Philepamen tooke in his hand; and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was fafe, when he heard an answere to his minde, he faid it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. Hee was seventie yeares old, and weakned with long fickneffe, whereby the poifon wrought the fooner, and casily tooke away his life. The Achaans, when they missed him in their flight, were maruelloufly offended with themselves, for that they had beene more mindfull to preserve their owne lives, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent 40 a Commander. Whilest they were denising what to doe in such a case: they got aduertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflieted: fo as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched vnto Messen, crauing his enlargement : and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armie against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands your himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the ashet of Philopemen, that were carried home in folemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all 50 of them flaine at his funerall, as facrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. O. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldome absent. He would have entermedled in this busines of Meffene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doc.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusius King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the warre against Eamenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spightfull enemie in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prufias (therein vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condifcend: or rather (as Linie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiors were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine having found cause before this to suf-10 pect the faith of Prustas, had deuised some secret fallies under ground to saue himfelfe from any treasonable and sudden affault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedie: which he then was constravned to practife, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him. as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of cscape, nor counsell to refort vnto, he tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwayes preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerse fortune; which being readie to swallow downe, he yttered these wordes: I will now (faid he) deliver the Romans of that feare, which hath fo many yeares 20 possest them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victorie of FLAMINIVS over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, Shall never be numbred among the rest of his heroicall deedes : No ; it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the World, how farre the auncient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For fuch was the nobleneffe of their forefathers; as, when PyRRHVs inuaded them in Italie, and was readie to give them battaile at their owne dores, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson: whereas these of a later race have employed FLAMINIVS, a man who hath heretofore beene one of their Confuls, to practife with PRVSIAS, contrarieto the honour of a King, contrarie to his Faith given, and contrarie to the Lawes of Hospitalitie, to slaughter or deliner up his owne Guest. He then cur-30 fing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to revenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poylon, and died.

In this yeare also (as good Authors have reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hamibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than infortunate. Certainely, for Hamibal, whose Tragedie we have now sinished, had he beene Prince of the carthaginians, and one who by his authoritic might have commaunded such supplies, as the Warre which he vindertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly cross by a cowardly and envious Fastion at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sultaine it, did o lastly dissolute ties in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and jealoufic of our Mafters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vaprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and jealous of men; the spoyles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of mieries layed on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Monluc the Marshall of France consession. That were not the mercies of Go o instinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his prosession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the evuelites, by them per 30 mitted and committed, were also instinite. How society, this is true, That the victories, which are obtayned by many of the greatest Commaunders, are commonly either assertion to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whome they serve. For the most of others, whose vertues have raysed them aboue the level of their inferiours, and have summonted their enuie; yet

haue they beene rewarded in the end, either with difgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolania, M. Liuiu, L. Amylius, and this our Scipio, whom wee have lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yealong before these times, it was a Legacie that Daniel bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ioab. With this fare Alexander feasted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Callander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Atim: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was strucken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, besides runne-awaies, an hundred and 10 fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Atius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left : for it was not long after that Maximus (by whole perswalion Valentian slew Atius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durst attempt, Atius living. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Atims, the glorie of the Westerne Empire was rather dissoluted, than obscured. The same vnworthie destinie, or a farre worse, had Bellisarius; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his cies torne out of his head by Instinian: and he died a blinde begger. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustine. That Rule of Cato 20 against Scipio, hath beene well observed in everie age since then, to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standethin awe of any one man. And hence have the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkifb one, That euerie warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of warre, than suffer his owne glorie to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiaret the fecond dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes, bring to ruine the most of their Vifiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonfalue, who draue the French out of Naples : and Ferdinando Cortefe, who conquered Chexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines 30 of all Nations, have beene paid with this copper coine 3 there are examples more than too many. On the contrarie it may bee faid, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of watre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have beene given, or offered, vnto verie few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many have vsurped them, by the helpe and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppreffed the libertie of free Cities : and the Licutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traiteroufly cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre : but have vied the advantage of some 40 commotion, or many of them, by base and cowardlie practises, have obtained those dignities, which undeferuedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that have purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in feeming, than in deed. Phoeas was a fouldiour, and by helpe of the fouldiours, hee got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but hee was a coward; and with a barbarous crueltie, seldome found in any other than cowards, hee flue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had dong him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudie aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Hercelius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Le-50 ontius laid hold upon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and cares, and sent him into banishment : but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had lest his owne men of warre. Instine, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fathion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Instine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastrasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Mafter Philippieus, and thruit out both his eyes. But with Anaftofius, Theodof.us dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, hee enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodofius; how many others have beene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captaines to make themselves Kings, have by GoDs justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way to of thriuing, by the practife of armes, is to take what may bee gotten by the spoyle of Enemics, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserved. But searce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulnesse in this kind, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Crie, and few men init, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And Edds 9.14. there was found a poore and wife man therein, and he delinered the Citie by his wifeome: but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thankes, least thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have been emecbted for great benefits: which the vnwifer fort of them thinke to fauour of fome impotencie in themselues. But in this respect they are oftentimes contened and abuled : which proues that weakeneffe to be in them indeede, whereof they fo gladly shunne the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giving thankes; yet fo, as those thankes are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines have made, by enriching themselves with the spoile of the enemie, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the wel-deservers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriously to rob them of their owne, ypon a falle suppolition : that euen they whose hands are most clean from such offences, have purloyned fomwhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipioes being so lately recited. In my late Sourraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne fafetie shee was constrained to vndertake, her Majestie had no lesse cause to vse the sernice of Martiall men both by Scaand land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeares had, yet, according to the destinic of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any scruice by them performed. And that her Majestic had many adnifed, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witnesse, who in all her daies neuer received dishonour, by the cowardife or infidelitie of any Commander, by her felfe chosen and imployed. 40 For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randel, Dremrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gibert, Cunftable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others : fo those of a later and more dangerous imploiment, whereof 2 orice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as cuer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Collonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many travailes and wounds) nortitle nor effate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. willoughbie of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Effates.

That her Majestie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeve other men than her selfe, a disease vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue beene subject, I say that such a confidence, although it may feeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weakeneffe. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous Actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, & among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which martiall men sildome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a Prosession faire more noble than their own, seeing therein they should onely mind their Maisters of the wrong they did into others, in giving less honour and reward to men of farre greater deserving, and of faire greater vse than themselves.

But his Majetite bath alreadie payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relicuing by Pentions all the poorer fort, he bath honored more Martiall men 10 than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred yeares.

He hath giucna Coronet to the Lord Thomas Haward for his chargeable and remarkeable feruice, as well in the yeare 1988, as at Caliz, the Hands, and in our owne Scas; hauing first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Majestie hath changed the Baronies of Mention and Burley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russel, Caren, Panuers, Arunded of Warder, Gerald, and Chiebester, Barons, for their governments and services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

. III.

PHILLE making provision for ware against the Romans, deales hardly with manie of his owne (whicess. His negotiation with the Bastarna. His crucitie. He suspected his some Demetarns. Vs. Demetarns accused by his brother Perseves and shortly after slaine, by his salvers appointment. Philler repented hims, it his somes death; whome he findeth to have been einnocent: and intending to revenue it on Perseves, he deith.

VINTYS MARTIVS the Roman Embaffador, who trauailed up and downe, feeking what worke might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to vie the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not seemeto have discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers,

That Philip had done what socuer they enjoyeed him; yet so, as it might appeare, that fuch his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessitie should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and fayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was denifing. Now it was fo indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequious nesset to the Romans, 40 and forefaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with fafetic of their honour, if they could finde convenient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what meanes socuer. He was in an ill case: as hauing been alreadie vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he prouided as well as he could deuise against the necesfitte which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritine Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad service against the Romans, hee compelled to for sake their dwellings, and removed them all 50 into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, he filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more affured, against those enemies that were terrible to the Masedonians. Further, he deuised vpon alluring the Baffarne, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who besides other great rewards, would helpe them to root out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Countrey. These were like to doe him notable service against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vinto him alone. The least benefite that could be hoped by their arrivall, must be the otter extirpation of the Dardanians, a People alwayes troubletome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whenfocuer they found aduantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarne, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expeditio on, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it felfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them upon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordsfei, and peraduenture fome others, through whose Countries they were to paffe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remove of these Bestarne from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Mucedon; a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to paffe. And thus hee fought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Roa mans, nor were knowne vnto them; fince he was not like to finde affiftance from anie ciuile Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these denices were long ere they tooke effect: fo as the Bestarne came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the trayning of his men to warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered upon him, and flood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell youn him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake o their auncient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his diferetion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within wordes: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparent. This cuill therefore would soone haue beene determined, had not his cruell and vindicatine nature made it worfe. He could not pardon words proceeding from just forrow; but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly fought reuenge where it was needleffe. In his rage he caused many to die : among whome were some eminent men; and sew or none o of them descruedly. This encreased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a barbarous and base furie, mistrusting all alike whome hee had injuried. thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill he should have massacred all the children of those parents, whome tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vinmanly pleafure, fome accidents, more tragicall than perhaps he could have defired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengcance powred on him from Heauen, he felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to fay what the Romans intended, in the extraordinarie fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may o well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish diffention betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreame jealousie in the fathers head . If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fall ion of their apparrell, or the vnfightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jefted at in ordinarie discourse and table-talke. Demetrius was fure to be presently on fire, defending and prayling them, even in fuch points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embaffadours, as often as they came, gaue his father caufe to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counfaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much least his brother should step betweene him and the succession, converted wholly, vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perfew was then thirtie yeares olde; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetries was younger by five Id yeares, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought old and craftie ynough, to entertaine more dangerous practiles, than his free speeches discouered. The jealous head of the King having entertained fuch suspitions, that were much encreafed by the cunning practife of his elder fonne, a flight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great folemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus. They eleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Armic was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the verie first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then fol 20 lowed the King betweene his two fonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whome all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Armie was divided into two parts: which, under the Kings two fonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vling poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinarie contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-carneftly feeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good fuccesse in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, vntill Perfeui his side at length recoyled. Perfess himselfe was sorrie for this, as it had beene some bad pre- 30 fage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vie. They were of the craftier fort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauor bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruices to the more malicious and craftic head. And now they faid, that this victorie of Demetrius would affoord matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemne pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spyes in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perfew his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indiscreetly, that he was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After some store 40 of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his traine behind, but forced them also to beare him companie. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselues secretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his dores, as if he stood in seare to be affaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himselfe excluded, and sared verie angerly with his brother. But Perfeus, bidding him be gone as an enemie, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertaine- 50 ment, no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the yonger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the same that bath beene here recited, saue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggrauate all the rest, was, That Demetries had vn dertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to vidertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect vnto his father, and was forrie to fee him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him : as alfo that they fought how to winne vnto Demetrius the lone of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, lent of late from T. Quinting to the King himfelfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wifely in fending Lemetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further doe well to fend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsell was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegeance of those, that should wayt upon his brother to Lome; and make them, forgetting their ducties to their old King, become feruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answere, by rehearing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in fuch manner as hee remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perfew, that converted matters of Passime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did beare him; Hee faid that it 20 grew, if not from his owne vertue, at leaftwife from their opinion thereof: fo as by any impious practife. He were more like to lofe it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not fuch passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; belides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a lealous father, That he would conclude nothing upon the excesse of error, whatfoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themfelues both in word and deed. And herein he may feeme to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to Perfeus: vling to little conference with his yonger fonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor neare vnto him. Aboue all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed betweene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interested in the quarrells betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they faw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents wherof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of 40 granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious defires had caused him to enter into practifes unfustifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his some a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in custodic, made show as if he had pitted the estate of the vnhappie Prince; and so wrung out of him his fecret intentions, which he shortly discouered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flie secretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to live in fafetie, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reversion vnto the 50 Crowne of Macedon. What focuer his hopes and meanings were, al came to nought through the fallhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the cleape, and in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolued to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away prinily, for feare left Pppppp

the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as proofe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Li dus therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappie Prince out of his life. This accurfed Minister of his Kings vinaduifed fentence, first gaue poyfor to Demetring which wrought neither so haltily, nor so secretly, as was defired. Hercupon bee fent'a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedie; who vilanously accomplished their worke by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Olive.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne bloud. The houses of Lysimachus and 12 Caffander fell cyther with themselves, or even vpon their heeles; by intestine difcord and lealouties, grounded on defire of fourraigne rule, or feare of looking it. By the like vinaturall hatred, had almost beene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and of seleueus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grieuoufly diffempered. Contrariwife, it was worthic of extraordinatie note, how that vpitart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raifed it felle to maruclous greatnesse, in verie short space, from the condition of meere slauerie; whereof a principal cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pictic. Neyther was Philip ignorant of these examples: but is faid to have propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne 22 for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to doe : not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Intigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minoritie. But Hee was himselfe of an unmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to bee a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon manie of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the fatiating of his bloud-thirftic appetite hee delightfully had committed your manie innocents, both ftrangers, & fubiects of his own; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poyfon. After the death of his fonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin 20 objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him fatisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not been contriner of the whole processe. His only remaining Son Perfew could so ill dissemble the pleasure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might eatily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remoue of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no leffe to be feared than at other times, when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vsuall trouble of mind, and carefulnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well understood the difference, be. 40 tweene a riling and a fetting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner defolate: some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with fulpitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had never beene flow to apprehend. He was much vexed; and so much the more, for that he knew, neyther well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Colen of his, named Antigonus, continued fortrue to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatefull to Perleus : and thus becomming subject vnto the same icalous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his fecrets. This counsailour, when hee found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and give 50 ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne Whether Demetrius were guiltie or no of the treason objected; as also that Philades and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epifile of Flaminius, that ferued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgeric in the business made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one Nychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and prefented vnto the King: faying that this fellow knew all, and must therefore bee made to vtter what hee knew. Xychus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected : confessing against himselfe, that hee had bin employed by the Embassadors in that wicked peece of bufineffe. No maruell, if the Fathers paffions were extreame, when hee vnderstood, that by the vnnaturall practife of one some, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous, and innocent. Hee raged exceedingly, against himto felfe, and withall against the Authors of the mischiefe. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie. Philocles was taken: and either for a fmuch as he could not denie it when Xyehus confronted him, yeelded himfelfe guiltie, or else was put to torture. Perfeus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flie the Countrie: yet not so stout as to adventure himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the kingdome, towards Thraze, whilest his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious fonne; tooke a refolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, & conferre it vpon Antigonus. But his weake bodie, and excelline greife of minde, fo disabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yelld to nature. He had raigned about two & fortie yeares: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himselfe, with continuall wars; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappie, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wife Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, he might thanke his owne peruerse condition: since his vncle King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well seried, as made it easie for him, to accoplish any rioderate defires, if he had not abhorred all good counsaile. Wherefore he was justly punished: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginarie happineffeofa Tyrant, which hee affected; and the life of a King, wherof he little cared 30 to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilest yet it was only drawing neare, was forefignified vnto Perseus, by Calligenes the Philitian; who also concealed it awhile from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine he no lesse improvidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

Mmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Baftarne into Thrace: where order had bin taken, long before, both for their free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrie. This compact was friendly observed, as long as none other was knowne than that Philip did live, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his feruice. But when it was heard, that a new King raigned in Macedon; & not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize; then was all dasht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bassana would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers, Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip: grew carefull of thriuning in the presents with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes, and the Baissana had the vaper hand, so as they chasted the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the vistors made little vieo? their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ourthrow, received by them in alsalving a place of strength; or whether because of extreame bad weather, which is said to have afflished them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, save thirtie thousand, which pierced on into Dardana. How these thirtie thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not find. It seems that by the caresesse wing of some countrie, such was the correlected wing of some victories, they drew losse voste wine clouses and sinally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countrie.

As for Perfeus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his mind to the setling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for war or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion: he quickly tookeaway the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; hee fate 20 personally to heare their causes in judgment (though herein hee was so ouer-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of justice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him fet forth. About all he had care to avoide all necessitie of warre with Rome and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadours thither to renew the league; which hee obtained, and was by the Senate faluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neyther was he negligent in feeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbors: but was rather herein fo exceffinely bountiful, that it may seeme a wonder, how in few yeares, to his vtter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeed the mastring passion, which ouer-ru- 30 led him, and changed him into fo manie shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions palt and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, butic in wars againft the Spaniar deand Ligurians, people often vanquithed, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered thrist, fubdued the rebelling Sarainsans, and had fome quarrels, though to little effect, with the Ulyrians and others. Our the Carthaginians they bore (as euer fince the victoric) a heavie hand: and infered Masaniss, to take from them what he littled. The Carthaginians, like obedient varilats to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were 40 bound by an article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Masaniss therefore had great advantage over them: and was not ignorant how to vie it. Hee could get possession by force, of what so ever the Romans not hardly entreated, to leave things as they sound them.

So had Hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporia: and so did hee withen againe and againe; with pretence of title, where hee had anie; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Malaniss had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Spphax wanne from Gals, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for love of his Wise 50 Sophonishs, and of Astrabad his Father-in-law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose judgment the case was reserred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to yeall manner of submissione obedience to Rome.

They had feareely this digefted injurie, when Mafaniffa came vpon them again, and tooke from them about feuentic townes and Caitels, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaffidors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senite. They thewed how grieuoufly they were oppreffed by reason of two articles in their League: That they thould not make warre, out of their owne lands nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were fo, that they might lawfully withfrand the violence of Mifaniffs, inuading their Countrie, howfocuer he was pleafed to call it his: yet tince hee was confederate with the Romans, they durft not prefume to beare detenfine armes against him, but fustered them-10 felues to be caten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherfore they entreared, that eyther they might have fairer inflice or be fufferd to defend their owne by firong hand; or at least, if right must wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would bee pleased to determine, how farre forth Majanifa should bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then defired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended ince the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchfafe to inflict on them fuch punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete : for that better and more to their comfort it were, to fuffer at once what should bee appointed by fuch Judges; than continually to live in feare, and none otherwise draw 20 breath, than at the mercie of this Numidian Hangman. And her ewithall the Embaffadours threw themselves proftrate on the ground, weeping, in hope to move compassion. Here may we behold, the fruites of their enuie to that valiant house of the Birchines; of their irrefolution, in profecuting a war fo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italies and of their halfepennie-worthing, in matter of expense, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they feruants, even to the feruants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, flaine, taken, and fold as bondslaues in the streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africk and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno to often and to earneftly defired. Only they want peace with Mafaniffa; once 30 their mercinarie, and now their mafter, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they befeech their mafters to take the office of correcting them, In fuch case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such profperitic as might haue bin their own. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who loft the battell at Canna; then Hannibal that wanne it was vied by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, eueric man of them, all his private riches, vpon the Common wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without crauing recompense: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreame want, to fet out an armie into Spaine, at what time the enemie lay vnder their owne wals. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthagi-40 nians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miscries belonging to the vanquilhed. Their pitifull behauiour bred peraduenture some commiferation, yet their teares may feeme to have beene millrufted, as proceeding no leffe from enuic to the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masanista: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a litle while, enter into coparisons with Rome. Wherfore they obtained no fuch leave as they fought, of defending their owne right by. armes: but cotrariwife, when without leave obtained they prefumed fo far, the defiruction of Carthage was thought an case punishment of that offence. At the pre-

the reason of his comming; and had related vnto him the complaint, made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father, not being throughly aware of anic Embassacra thither sent from Carthage in had

In the midft of all these cares, the Romans had not been evnmindfull of Persens. They vilited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behauiour. These Hee entertained kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) hee perceiued whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the trobles in Dardania: neyther would they take any fatisfaction. untill the Bastarna were thence gone though hee protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no leffe ill contented with good offices, by him done to fundrie of his neighbours, than with 30 those wrongs, which they said (that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to anie; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where he did good; they called fuch his bountie, feeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subjects, upon what ocasion it is uncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their gouernour. It feemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to have presumed so farre, vnleffe eyther they had bin extreamly prouoked; or elfe were fecretly animated by the Romans. Whatfocuer it was that bred this courage in them: Perfens did foone allay it, and reclaime them by firong hand. But the Romans tooke veric angrily, 40 this presumption of the King: even as if he had invaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the same yoake with the Carthaginians; whereto had he humbled once his necke, they could themselves have done the part of Mafanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betweene them were fuch, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their license first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine have reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents even such as had entred into league with them vpon equal 50 tearmes: whom vfually they rewarded with a frowne, whenfocuer they prefumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hercofthe Acheans had good experience: whose condence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chattifed the Mellensans by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking fuch a worke in hand, without hisauthoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblaby at other times were they reprehended euen with Lordly threates, when they tooke vpon them to carrie any bulinesse of importance, by their owne power, without flanding vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheleffe, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little; and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were

of the Historie of the World.

10 not like to thriue; especially in vsurping the practise of armes, which belonged only to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vntoward Polyb. legat. 51. schollars, that they needed, and not long after felt, veric tharp correction. Yet was $ 53. there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Acheans; refused not only to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a carelesse insolencie, rejected this honest and reafonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argines, Lacademonians or Corin-

20 thians, would repolt from the Achaans; they themselves would think it a businesse no way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleeved, that the Common wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by conntenance of the Romans. All this notwithflanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achaens had vtterly subdued the Mesfenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Towne rebelled from the Acheans, but manie entred into their corporation : then did the Romans, with an ilfauored grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made fuch bad answere (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citic) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to bee carried to Messen. Thus 30 thinking, by a fained grauitie, to have ferued their owne turnes; they manifelted their condition; both to let on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspe-Red; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soveraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which diffemblingly they would have feemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates; not permitting anie of them to make warre, whether offensiue or defensiue; though it were against meere strangers; without interpoling the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vuleffe peraduenture sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towardes the accomplithment of their owne fecret malice. Now these Roman arts how socuer manie (for gainfull or timerous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citic in Greece, having neyther subjects of their own that might rebell, now power wherewith to bring anic into fubication; for want of more noble argument wherein to practife their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient comendations, were much delighted in flattering thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and Kingdomes, that with ouer Jo nice diligence strone to preserve their liberries and lands, from consuming by piecemeale: they were to be denoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vipliant, and wherein manie of the Greekes beganne to haue affiance, was necessarily to bee made an example, how much better it were the most mightie. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mithridates being men vnfit for action, and

CHAP. 6. S.4.

Neyther

Neyther Perfeus, nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time ftood affected. Perfess by reason of his neare neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopaman had long fince foretold; of the miferable Subjection, Whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly fensible of their libertie, felt themselves grieved with the present subjection, wherto alreadie they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had 10 the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrie, and would for no ambition, or other feruile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone beeat an end; when honestie and loue of the Commonweale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this carefull prouifionfor the lafetic of Greece, the Romans were not throughly aductifed; cyther because things were diligenly concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies, or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom eueric Citie in Greece) had too manie) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore 20 more li ke to speake malitiously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselues, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their ownedelires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which manie know, from those that are feared or flattered by manie. The Acheans being to fend Embaffadours to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callierates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of fuch a man; one may perceive the advantage, which mischicuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vil defires, have against the plaine fort of 30 honest men , that least carnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome bufincise of the weale publike. For this Callierates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Countrie, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alleadging what was meetest in instification of his people: hee vttered a quite contrarie tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heavie hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the fetling of their authoritie, among his froward Countrimen; if they ment not wholy to foregoeit. For now there was taken vpa custome, to fland vpon points of con- 40 federacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any iniunction from Rome notwitstanding. Hence grew it that the Achaens both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by sorce of some Law, they were discharged, or hindred, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if He, and some other of his opinion, might have their wils: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columnes or Monuments erected, nor no folemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the observance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was cuen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to give 50 care, vnto fuch perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the found of libertie vsed to bee more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming never so bad, were

increase apace, and they became the prevalent faction. It was therefore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the advacement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wifely, though with seditious & rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea & ordinarily, conferred great honors, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for having vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these & the like reasons, wherwith he exhorted the to hadle roughly those that were obstinate, & by cherishing their friends, to make their partie itrong, resolued to follow this good counsaile, in cuery point; yea to depresse al those that held with the right, & to set vp their own 10 followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt theceforth more peremptorily with the Achains, than had been their manner in former times; but wrot at the present vnto alcities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates; they aduised all men, to be fuch, and so affected, as he was, in their severall comon-weales. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a joyfull man: having brought his Countrie into the way of ruine, but himselfe into the way of preserment. Neverthelesse hee forbore to vant himselfe, of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Only he so reported his Embaffage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherwith he threatned 20 those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts hee obtained to bee made Pretor of the Acheans: in which Magistracy, as in al his courses following, hee omitted nothing, that might scrue to manifest his readie obsequiousnes vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes wan manie flatterers, and loft as many true friends: so Perfeus on the otherlide, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promifes, to affure vnto himfelfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honester than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wher-30 in they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: wherofif not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall affoord them iust occasion to make war vpon him. Perfess having finished his bustnesse among the Dolopians, made a journie to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his armie along with him, yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his journie, but the good affectio towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, hee dealt himselfe; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the 40 memorie of all wrongs what soener, done by his father, might bee butied with his father; fince his own mening was to hold friendship sincerely with al his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could have beene pleased better, if he had behaved himselse after a contrarie fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to have taken such a journie, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Acheans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbad any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them 50 cause to abhor him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, bin to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they resolued to for sake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for prescruation of concord among them, to vse all circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Countrie towards him to doubtfully affected: especially when by bearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of war, and when all danger of innovation was past; was vncjuill, if not inhumane, as nourithing deadly hatred, without leaving meanes of reconciliation. And hereof the Acheans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like fort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon: yet understanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their mafters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers:exfaine he would have changed into loue. He therfore apprehended al these sugitives, to fend them home againe; and wrote vnto the Achaans, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to restore back their fernants; so should they do very wel to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily understood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearfed by the Pretor, before the Councell, But Callier ates took the matter very angrily; and bad them be aduited what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendship of the before hand acquainted with the war, that was comming vpon Perfeus, from Rome. He rold them, how Philip had made preparations for the same wars how Demetrius had bin made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Per/eus had, fince his being King, done manie things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly

Herehearfed all those matters, which were afterwards alleaged by the Romans; the inualion of the Bastarna, vpon the Dardanians; the Kings journic against the Dolopi-ans; his voyage to Delphi; and finally his peaceable behaviour, which was (he faid) a dangerous temptation of men to his partie. Wherefore he aduited them, to expect the event of things, and not over-halfily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answere was made by the Pretors brother: That 30

Callierates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neyther one of the Kings cabbinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had paffed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Per-fews had renewed his league with the Romans; that hee was by them faluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that He had louingly entertained their Embassadours.

This being so: why might not the Achaans, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians, E-pirots, and althe Greeks, hold with him fuch correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuertheleffe Callierates was growne a man fo terrible, by his Romanacquaintance, that they durst not over-stiffely gainfay him. Therfore the matter was folue. Better it was to fay thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needs vrge them further, and fend Embassadours: then were they faine, without anie good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and denie to give audience:

How EVMENES King of Pergamus was builed, with PHARNACES, the Rhodoians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom hee accuse the to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly , and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The unusual stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadours. PERSEVS his attempt upon EVMENES. The brotherly loue betweene EVME-NES and ATTALVS. PERSEVS his device to poyon some of the Roman Senatours: whereupon they decree warre against him, and lend him defiance. Other thinges, concerning the inflice of this warre.

V ME NES King of Pergamus had beene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridages his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with coortable words & promise,

That they, by their authoritie, would end the butines, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, hee ended the warre himselfe; and brought his Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleafed him to give them. After this being at good leifure; hee beganne to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood under Perfeus. His hatred to Perfew was verie great: and therefore hee was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemie, was as great, and withall notorious. Now befides his ancient and hareditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wex euerie where stale: whilest Perfeus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuic borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old triends: and in helping these rebels 30 was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found hee, in these poore and indirect courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not bee faued by his patronage, from seuere and cruell chastissement, given to them by the Bhodians. This rendred him contemptible: as likewife, his acts of hostilitie, litle different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into Polyb.Legat.74. neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Acheans, as too vnmcasured, misbeforeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deferuings. All this (which hee needed not to have regarded, had hee not beene too 1 ide lib. 42. vainly ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-serviceable to the Ro-40 mans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it vaine to firiue any longer with bountie, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the general fauour. And therefore her resolued even to overturne the foundations of this Popularitie, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idoll, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainly worshipped. Neyther would t proue a difficult matter, To perswade those that were alreadie desirous rather hee was like to bee highly thanked, for fetting forward their wifnes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some peece of the Kingdome, as he had bin rewarded, for the 50 like feruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end, He made a fecond voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to fig which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with fuch attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltic, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius; the expedition of the Basiarne into Dardania; that of Perfeus himfelle against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Ascedonian in Greece, his intermedling in bulinesse of his neighbours, his riches, and his great proutions : were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He descended vnto particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee faid, That Perfeus had thirtie thousand foot, and five thousand Horse of his owner monie in a readinesse to entertaine tenne thousand mercinaries for tenne yeares: armes, to furnith a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, readie, at a call, to bring him foldiours as manie as he should require; and that hee prepared victuals for tenne yeares, because he would not bee driven, eyther to live to vpon spoile, or to take from his owne subjects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to confider, that King Seleneus the fonne and successor of Antiochus the great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perfeus; Perfeus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prulius of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the lifter of Perfeus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassagesfrom all quarters. Neyther spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loath to veter it plainly) That even the envie to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruelloully well affected to his fonne. All this, and some facts of Perfeus, which might cyther bee denied, or instified (as that hee had procured the death of some 20 which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Abripolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: saying that hee thought it his dutie to forewarne them; fince it would bee to Himselfe a great shame, if Ferfess got the start of him, and were in Italie making war vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great follie, to beloeve that the Romans flood in feare of Perfeus, leaft he should set vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their affociates, but of further hurt intended: great thankes were given to Eumenes, who had 30 euery way furnished them with such goodly colour to beautific their intendment. Now though it were fo, that He told them litle elfe than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon anie relation made by their owne Embassadours, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them, their injustice, and oppression, would have beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asa, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their own right and 40 fecuritie? Toward this justification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto, their more than vivall curiofitie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embalfadours were at Rome, prouided of answeres to the words, which they knew before hand that hee would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanitic, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to have disclosed all: when the warinesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of fome fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooved their wisdome to neglect no possible remedie. Wherefore carelesse audience was given to the Rhodian Em- 50 baffadours; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Ala, than Antioabus had ever beene, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhedians had with great pompe, conveighed by Sca vnto Perfew, his bride Landier; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully acCHAP.6.S.5. of the Historie of the World.

cepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycisms, as alreadic vanquilhed, were feeling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embaffadours came from 60.00 for. Rome with thrange newes which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it flood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection and people or Nation by them vanquilhed; and that the Lycians were by them affigued visco those of Rhodes, not as meere vasfals, but as dependants and affociates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victoric against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Alsfanissa, The Etolians, o and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to find the solutes agricued if they wel considered the matter: fince by force of this or the like decree, those their subjects might casily bee made their fellowes, when soeuer it should please the Senate: though it were so, that al men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perfeus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the cares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dillike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embaffadours; which indeed more nearely touched themselues. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his love to

But the Micedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessely as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perfeus delired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might sauour of hostilitie; but that, it his trauaile in this kind proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falles out contrarie to expectation. These big words may seeme to have proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpilus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from jo instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perfeus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps vtterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouering his too much weaknesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a works of fuch importance. Wherefore He, or his Embaffadour for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not verie bad, but subject (in appearance) to Fortune, which might have beenehis, had he knowne how to vie it.

Now that this brauerie (as better it may bee termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heats it appeares by his daring to aduenture foone after, on a practife that more justly might anger the Ramans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make war vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe facrifice to Apollo, Perfess deadly hating him, and thirsting after his bloud, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a facrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischieuous enemie. So there were appointed three or foure four ruffians to do the murder: who placing themfelues behind a broken mud wal, on the fide of a verienarrow path leading vp from the Seato the Temple; did thence affault the King, whom they forely bruifed 50 with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended, made them, without flaying to fee all fure, flee in such halt, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discouer them. Eumenes was conneighed away to the little Isle of .E.

gina, where he was cured being all the while kept fo fecretly, that the fame of his death was current in Alia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke voon him as king and either took or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of state) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom hee then thought the widdow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other checke, than that He should forbeare to marrie with the Queene, untill Hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise At- 10 talus forbore to attempt anything to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour, when Eumenes felinto their hatred) were in good readinesse, to have transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By fuch concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus ray led and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon have beenedif Demetrius had lived and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perleus.

It is likely that Perfew was verie glad when he understood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had faued all from discouerie. But as hee was deceited in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived : so was Hee 20 beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement, which hee vainly effeemed the lesse materiall. For He had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he fent about this busines; and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending youn the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Falering also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, onc Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who comming newly from the court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret; had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundusium was the ordinarie port, for ships patting betweene Italie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein hee gaue entertainment, being a wealthie man, to Embassadours, and other honours- 29 ble personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of fuch his hospitalitie, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose manie courtesies to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or defired, made partaker of the Kings fecrets. The fumme of all was, That hee must needs doe a turne, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare leaft the vertue of this medicine should bee tryed upon himselfe. But being once at libertie; he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, 40 and one whom the King had neuer feene before, nor was like to fee againe and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the acculation was improbable. Thus did Perfeus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in likesort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, eyther in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such objections were not to bee made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulnesse of making war vpon him; but rather vnto a fubject pleading for his life in judgment. But howfocuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might have bin easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perfess was very futeable to these practises. Neyther did the Senate greatly stand 50 to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Effate, wherin he supposed that they ought not to touch him for fuch private offences, it gave him no priviled gethey judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein furely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not fend men, to wast the Kingdome of Pergamus, or to beliege the townes: might he fend Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no leffe breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the fword : wasit lawfull for him to doe it by Poyfon? Wherefore they prefently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemes, at this time, to have beene so confident, in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he defired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by to shew of courage, to make his enimies the more calme. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being wearie they departed without andience. Then called he them back; and bad them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long beene collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him:adding thereto, that He had entertained long and secret conference in the Isle of Samothrace, with Embassadours sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have flood vpon the cuidence, brought against him by Rummius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to 20 build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a king, to be strong, welbeloued, and well friended. Per/eus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedic, Proud, Infolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embaffadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answere: which was to this effect; That hee would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeed onely for feare: but wished them to descend to more equal conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs. In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is let downe Polyb Legange by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience 30 in the future ; excepting those which he immediatly performed. But Linie inserts Lin.Lib.33. a clause, whereby he was expressely forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederats were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had beene restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which never was agreed vpon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this

out their permission: then had Persew very instreason to find himself agricued. For 40 since they had allowed his father, without controlle, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargaine after another falhion? Wasit now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his Owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that inuaded Macedon? By fuch allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league, as vniust; hee ministred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to giue him desiance. Hauing heard the worst of their message; he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdome in three dayes. But either hee should have beene lesse vehement; or more constant in his resolution. For if his 50 heart could ferue him to vndertake the warre; hee should couragiously have managed it, and have fallen to worke immediatly, whilest the Enemie was vnprepared; not have lost opportunitie, as now and often hedid, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

The flattering Alabanders.

Olong had the Romans beene feeking occasion to take in hand this

Macedonian warre, that well they might have bin readic for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in prouisions. But it was on a fudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences 20 to make the warre, : whereof, it no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together, seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to beleeue, that their owne firength was fuch as would prevaile in the end; they ballily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who mustafterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, 30 and take part with the Macedonian; such was the diffension betweene their fenerall clistes; how focuer the generalitie of them were inclined the fame way. Neuertheleffe Embassadors were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe a. paint Perfeus, or rather to demandit, in no leffe ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embaffadors vsed as gentle words, for fallions sake; as if they had flood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now growne well acquainted with fuch Reman courtefie : and vinder flood, that not only fuch as made refufall, but even they who might feeme to have granted halfe ynwillingly; were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse 40 was ended. Wherefore none of them were ferupulous in promiting the belt of their helpe to the Romans; * the Acheans and Bhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should bee ill taken, as if they had balted in some pare of their dutie. It is strange that men could bee so earnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have feene the ruine. The vulgar fort was every where addicted to Per/eus 3 of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not oppolers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea the wifeft and most honesta who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus then to the Ros mans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one : who 50 though Hee * judged the victorie of Perfeus, like to propue hurtfull vnto dreeus yet wished hee the Romans ill to thrine, that so the Greekes might recouen perfect libertie : for his endenours in which course, hee was: at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not onely renerence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Achaans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their scare, may be justly imputed vinco the timorous demeanour of Perfeus himselfe. He had vndertaken a war, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him; than he began to speake the enemic faire, and sue for peace at Rome, Since therefore it was knowne, that every small thing would ferue to terrific him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans to power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leifure vpon those which had affisted him: little cause was there, why any should aduenture to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wife men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble fuit vnto the Roman Embaffadors. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finenes in cunning then was vivall among the Romans; made flew of inclination to the Kings defire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, 20 and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Wherto though Perfew made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as there with satisfied; and admifed him to give the like fatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently bee done; a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his defire; which was to make the King lofe time. For Perfeus had all things then in readines, and might have done much, ere the Roman armie could have bin in Greece. But by the interpolition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he suffred a most couenient feafon, of winning your the enemie, to flip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elfe, than leifure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleafed herewith, as it 30 had bin with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to viderstand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. Hee fent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, not with standing the goodnes of his cause, hee should be denied peace. These were poore helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honor, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearefulnes might feeme excusable, and the blame therof to ap-40 pertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly their own; had it not bin his office, who took vpon him as their Champion, to give fuch a manly beginning to the warre, as might incourage al others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more sucree from him, and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhedians, among whom he had many front partizans, defired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might feem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Buotians also, who had entred of late into a firict fociety with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yeelded themselues as vasials. Neither was 50 Martius contented to accept their submission under a generall forme; but caused their feuerall towns to make couenant apart, each for it felfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little common-weales, they might not (were they never fo desirous to rebell) have such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Baotians Qqqqqq 3 from Thebes their their head; was more than Agefilans could effect, or Epaminondas would fuffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians. So far more availeable to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the focietie with King Perfess, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilest the King sate still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embaffadors which Perfess had fent; audience 10 was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded : but neither excuse, nor intreatic, would serve their turne; the Senate being resolved before hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirtie daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy swhereas they who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walles, in the Temple of Bellona (the viual) place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to fuch Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had only the short warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue alone to hide the craft of Martins, as if hee had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely mean, both to keep a long while 23 from Perfew the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Conful, was at Apollonia; in a manner as foone, as the Macedonian Embaffadors were with their king at Pella Which though it were enough to have rouzed Perfew, and have made him lay as fide all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans; and to redeeme their good will with some part of his kingdome, that so he might eniov the reft; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the floutest counsaile preuailed: which also was the wifest; and so would have proved, had it beene stoutly 30 and wifely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne untill now, to doe what should have bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendeuous at Citium, a towne in Macedon. All being in readines, he did royall facrifice, with an hundred beafts, to I know not what Mfnerua, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then, with all his Courtiers; and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelve thoufand foot, and a thouland horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the infolencie of the Romans, the 40 goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemic, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their fenerall abilities. He gaue them thanks : but answered, That his owne prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that countrie, in their journey towards him. Some townes of The sale opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend 50 themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wanne by force. Of these last was My/a; a towne thought impregnable, and therefore, not more floutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the affailants. It was taken by reason of a salie; which the Townsimen rashly made, and being driven backe, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practifed heere: to the greater terror of the oblinate. So Velatic and Connus (towns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of offa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the king marched onwards to Sycurium, a towne feated on the foot of mount offa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemie.

CHAP. 6.5.6. of the Historie of the World.

Licinius the Conful brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promifed other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attato las his brother, came to him in Theffalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from eucry part of Greece, such aide as the seuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to fend; which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had fent to Rome his yong sonne, there to be brought vp? yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselse began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had beene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on : as being allied to Perseus, and yet fea-20 ring the Romans. Antiochus, and Ptolemie (though Ptolemie was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to inuade the Agyptian: yet each of them promifed helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Matedonian : yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettic tricke, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fittie thippes, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose; all which Eugretius tooke away, after a very kind fort; making thew to beleeue, That for none other end than to ferue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had fent thither this fleery But what focuer Gentius thought in 30 the beginning; he foolilhly loft both his kingdome and himfelfe, in the end of this war , by offering, rather then giving, his helpe to Perfeus.

With none other company than what he brought ouer the fea, Licinius came into Theffalie: fo tyred with a painfull journey, through the mountainous country of Athamsnia, which flood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready; attending his descent into the Plaines; the Romans must needs have taken a great onerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the ruer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any flender helpe, that dould enable him to deale with Perfeus. Therefore he refolded, to abide where he then was, and keepehis trenches, vntill his numbers 40 were sufficiently increased : contenting himselfe in the meane while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of Theffalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece belides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heavie yoake of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of fuch a benefit. It was generally rich fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midft of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly ful of all delights, that the name was often vfed at large, to fignific the most pleafant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Off and Olympus (famous in Poesse) with their Spurres or bran-50 ches, by which it was on all lides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie.

And this way were the Romansto enter into Macedon; unlesse they would make an bungrie journey, thorow the countrey of the Daffaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by millpending of time he had not loft it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worle; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) enery yeare more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might have done far greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of dows, which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreame difficultie, must the Romans have either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or elfe have committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, vnto the mercie of feas that were very dangerous; if they would have fought other way to into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwith it anding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be faid, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Ltolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspition with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) even as soone as they met with Perseus. The Baotians, how politikely focuer Martius had wrought with them, aducntured themselves desperately in the Macedonians quarrell: what would they have done, if he at first had done 20 his best ? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to waver, when they faw things goe better with Perfess, then they had expected. So that if in flead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well willers, yea and bought downe with money (as hee might haue done) fome of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence; to forget his broken head; then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to forfake their imperious patronage oner Greece; and to render the libertie, by them given, entire; which other wife was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, fince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason have beene ex- 30 pected at first, from greater advantages. But as a searefull companie running from their enemies, till some river stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would have wonne the victorie: fo fell it out with Perfews. In feeking to avoid the danger of that war, whereof he should have sought the honor; hee left his friends that would have flood by him, and gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to be driven into such miserie, as was incuitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Theffalie, it is hard to shew 40 particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Conful having no defire to fight, vntill fuch time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches, and lay still encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Lariffa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the contrer vnto a hasty triall. Wherforche inuited the Romans into the field; by walling the land of the Phereans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduenture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victorie his owne. At his comming they were trou- 50 bled; for that it was fudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to bee fafely lodged. They fent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were flaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor En-menes, found it reasonable to hazzard battaile. Thus day after day, a while together, Perfess continued offering battaile: which they fill refused. Hereby his boldnes much encreased; and much more, his reputation; to the griefe of those, who being to farre come to make a conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these branadoes. The towns of Sycurium, where Perfeus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither-wasthere any convenient watering in that long march, which vied to take vp foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both wearie and thirstie when they came to fight. For remedie of these inconne-10 niences, he found out a lodging, feuen miles neerer to the Enemie; whom he vilited the next day by the Sunne rifing. His comming at fuch an vnufuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though hee brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to affaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give checke to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: he himfelfe remaining in the Campe; with his Legions in readineffe, The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victorie in a manner entire, (though the Theffalians made a good retrait) with little loffe to of his owne. But he discourred his weaknesse ere mght, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe; to counfaile given by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare left he should affault their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vufent for : he neuertheleffe tooke it for found aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victorie; by which meanes it was faid. That either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwife many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it bin greater; and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would have been the more, and the bol-30 der. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace : and in fuing for it, cuen when he had the victory, what elfe did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yeelding to the Romans, whenfocuer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the low of his victorie would admit none of these considerations. Hee had flaine of the Roman horfetwo hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot he had flaine about two thou fand: lofting of his owne no more than twentie horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this delaster, was full of heavinesse and seare: it being much doubted that the enemie would set upon it. Eumenes gaue counfaile to dislodge by hight, and romone to a surer place beyond 40 the River Peneus. The Conful, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he flood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the Jossepast, than by standing on proud tearmes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the River in the dead of the night, and incamped more frongly on the further fide. The Atolians were forely blamed for this loffe; as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight; wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Fine of them, that were memor respeciall marke, had been observed, to be the first which turned their backes: an observation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leifure; Asfdr the The flillians, their vertue was honored with reward: foas the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, 50 that if they would shunnesiddignation, or incurre fauour, then must they aduenture no leffe for their Lordothe Ramanh, than gladly they would doe for their own libertie. Thus fared it with the Conful and his armic. Perfeus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, hee not vntill then

haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victorie, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have rowted them, whilest they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might have been done: fince there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, cuen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors, Confuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea they were beaten fo shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoiles of them without relistance, as yeelding themselues ouercome. With fuch braue words did the King fet out the glory of his action; dividing the spoiles 10 among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honor found. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopfelus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Lariffa: as if it were his meaning to preffe them somewhat harder. Neuerthelesse hee was easily perswaded to vie the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore hee sent vnto the Conful, and offered to yeeld vnto the same conditions, wherein his father had beene bound to the Romans; if the war might fo take end. It were needleffe, heere againe to show the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this defired peace, there was in the Conful no greater power, than to grant a truce, whileft Embaffadors might goe to Rome: it refting in the Senate and People to approoue the 20 conditions, and ratific the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answere, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to bee so resolute in aduersitie. On the other fide, it argued a very faint heart in Perfess, that having received an answere fo peremptorie, he still persisted, making vaine offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the king withdrew himselfe backe to Sycurium. There he lay bearkening what the Enemie did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the sonne of 32 Masanissa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance betweene the King and them, caused the Romansto waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged ouer all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which hee attempted, both vpon their Campe, and upon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to have fired on the fudden: but the alarme being taken in good feafon, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could have withdrawneit, and given over in time. But whileft he froue to force a gard, he was vifited by the Conful; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battaile, he was ouercome. This misaduenture, whether great 40 or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally given to feare danger, even where none was : whereby what loffe he felt will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, faue only Tempe, weakly guarded: and confequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connus; hoping to have taken it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned backe upon the Perrhabians and others; from whom hee wanne fome townes, and among the rest, Lariffa. There were fundrie townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larifa: so that this which the Conful tooke, may seeme, not to have belonged vnto the Theffalians; vnleffe, perhaps, after his victorie, Per- 50 feus did greater actes than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Baotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Nauic on their coaft. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other pettie townes, which by that same distraction of the Baestians, became within themselues more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to have beene fought among the changes happening in their variable factions: wherof the knowledge is now loft. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that hee would have brought others to rebell in like fort, if by extreame oppression hee 10 could have driven them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Conful undiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perfeus. I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is faid in generall; That in the warre which he made, he * cruelly and couctoully demeaned himselfe.

CHAP. 6. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeare following; Hostilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Pretor of the Fleet. Hostilius shewd more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in profecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war ypon his kingdome, after that the Conful had fought passage in vaine ouer certain mountaines, Perfeus feemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed *, Pobbileget 20 on that fide which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Conful fent 700 thither with an armie of foure thousand, and who, by leauies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to have taken V/cana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; falled forth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly hee escaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of V/cana shortly after became Roman: which howsoeuer it happened, Perfeus very soone reconcredit, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian king, securing him on the one fide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, revolted from the Romans, on 30 the other. Perseus likewise made a painfull journey into Atolia: where hee was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That (Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleuds, one of his Lieutenants. Such fuccesse had the Micedonian war under Hostilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors trauelling thorow all the Cities of Peleponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to aduance their busines, than of those which 40 were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in Polyb.Legat.74. the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopamen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achean horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honorably discharged. The summe of the accusation should have beene; That these were not heartic friends vnto the Romans, but fuch as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But fince no colour of truth could bee found, that might give countenance to fuch a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approoued the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no leffe then a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary lide, there wanted not some, who soundly told these pick thankes of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such fort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors caried themselves, as men that could beleeve none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The belt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. 10 Of this decree the whole countrie was glad : for it was, or feemed, a good remedie of many inconveniences. But they that flanding on priviledge hereof, refused to fulfill every commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worse, than to have beene traytours. The Senate was dimen to fet downe this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magiltrates, and especially by the Admiralls, Lucretius and Hortenfius. Lucretius was condemned in a great fumme of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subicets oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to 29

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to lecke redreffe of iniuries, or to offer their feruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the leffer Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base peece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets; and a crowne of gold, to bestow voon Inpiter in the Capitol. But having a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would bee fingular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance : they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniversarie games to beecelebrated among them, in honour of that 22 Goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemie, and the like vaine men, that would bee thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, divine honours; when hee sees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a Goddesse, and receiuing (without scorne of thegiuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

O. MARTINS the Roman Conful, with extreame difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of PERSEVS in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by MARTINS; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, withill successe. Their affaires in hard effate. MARTIUS a cunning and a bad man. POLYBIVS fent Embassador to MARTIVS from the Achaans, POLY-BIVS his honest wildome beneficiall to the Acheans. King EV MENES growes averse from the Romans. PERSEVS negotiates with ANTIOCHYS and EVMENES. His falle dealing with GENTIVS King of Illyria; whom hee drawes into the Roman warre. He fends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainly take upon them to be arbitrators betweene him and the Romans. PERSEVS lofeth a mightie succour of the Bastarns, by his wretched parsimonie.

Fter two yeares of the Mucedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had been thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans defired; as it did in the end. Perfeus had hitherto the better, and was itronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had 20 enlarged his borders on the Illyrian lide; his friends, in all patts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew fuch, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the iffue of the war might proue, and therupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Mucedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselves, that many towns, even of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Roman fide; and the armie much leffened, not only by calualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one 30 vpon the other) in licencing the fouldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Conful, who fucceeded vnto Hostilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheleffe was more than he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supplie of men. He began hotly to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept. And he began the right way : not feeking to force the streights that were surely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines, which were thought able to forbid all paffage over them, without helpe or need of any cultodie. The King heard of his approch; and being uncertaine what way he meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit ascent But the Conful proceeded in his journey; with hope, either not to bee discouered by the Enemie, or to breake through all opposition, or at least wife, to fight on as conucnient ground, as they should have that lay to slop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a lafe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedit foot, to discouer the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in ouercomming the difficultie of no more than lifteene miles: after which they had light of the Enemie, that lay to denv their paffage. They occupied therefore a lafe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten vnto them : which he did. The Mucedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arrivall; but methim, and fought with him, two or three dayes together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bie-59 kering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed : all the rest were beholders. In this case it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Abritus tooke the only courferemaining; and indeed the best-Part of his men he left with Populus, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilest hee, them the better to endure the labour. Perfeus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: fince they fought with his men ypon the paffage, three dayes together; he lying fo nigh, that he might wel neare have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with seare; that he 40 neither flirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Conful, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, sate hearkening after the euent. Foure only paffages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were vnable to force: the second and third were the fame which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the laft, by the Citic of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded; and whofocuer would feeke any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, faue through the valley it felfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the 50 foot of the huge mountaine Ohmpus, about a mile from the fea: of which mile the river Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke up the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily have beene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middeft of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neare to the verie banks of Penews, a goodly and deepe river which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more eatie, than to make the Conful repent him of his troublefome journey : if Perfess could have feene his owne advantages. For the Roman armie was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable travell:but must needs have either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the fame way that it came, if the King had made good the fireight of Dium. To have returned, and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rockes, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemes a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemie, from about their heads, would have beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they fiole away from him. It may therefore bee thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Micedon, from the fide of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often bin inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no meanes to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. But the cowardize of Perfeus, did commend the counfaile by them followed, as wife. For he no fooner heard that the Enemic was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; than he 20 fared like one out of his wits; faying, That he was vanquished, & had loft all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in hafte; and ftraightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the fea : as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as wel as he could: though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recoursed by Diners from under the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to fet fire on the Kings Arlenall, deferred the execution; forefeeing that repentance might follow: and to he prevented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicas, for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their service was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hastie direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the sea by their diving, were payd their wages after the same fort : that so there might be no witnes of the Kings base folly, Such end must they feare, who are privic to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perfeus would have gone furely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally have behaved himselfe, that no man might beleeve him to 40 be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitie. He thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippins away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Asclepiodatus, from desence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed he rated them openly slaving, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemie the gates and barres of Mucedon. Of this reproch if they would discharge themsclues, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have feed as did Nicias and Andronicus.

CHAP.6. S.7. of the Historie of the World.

The Conful Marsius had great cause to rejoyce, for that the King so hastily relinquilbed his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the 50 Roman armie, this notwithstanding was hardly able to sublist, for want of victuals. He tooke Dium without refistance; & thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towne that yeelded, he was compelled, by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to have holpen him in the war; but having left behinde, at Magnefia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been carefull to occupy the Caltles about Tempe, which were for faken by the Macedonians: for by those waies only might come be brought into the army. To meet the fooner with this corne, which was defiroufly expected; he for looke Diam, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bin worth. It is probable, that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemie, he should be faine to quit it. Howsocuer it was:men 10 thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behoued him to have prosecuted the action. By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himfelfe; understood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed; and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly reposses the town of Dium, which he haitily repaired, finding it difmantled by the Komans. This done; he encamped strongly by the river Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Leffe diligence, more timely vfed, would have bin enough, not onely to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace; but to have given him fuch a noble victory, as might 20 cause the Romans to seek a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recourry and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towns of Heracles, flanding on the river of Penews, five miles from Dium, was taken by force : or rather by a trick of climing upon mens heads, somewhat after the maner of our tumblers. But it made such desence as it could; and was not given up for feare. After this Martius did fet a bold face towards Drum; as if he would have taken it againe, and haue driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to prouide for his wintering. He fent the Admirall to 39 make attempt vpon the sea-townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were affayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and fome companies, that fundrie times aduentured forth of the towne, were fill put to the worfe. As for the towne it felfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or fea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherfore the Admirall fetting faile from thence, ranne along by Ania, and Antigonea (landing neare to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vntill he came to Pallene, in the territory of Callandrea. There King Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twentie ships of warre: and fine other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his 40 fortune at Caffandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perfeus, before the town: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thece, for that it lay not vpon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town wal filled vp with that earth, and courred with one fingle row of brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping the walls. To this worke he appointed fuch as hee thought meetest: giving an alarme to the other side of the towne, therby to shadow his attempt. The breach was foon made. But whilest the Romans were shouting for ioy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceined what was done; & falying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the com- 50 panies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they flew about fix hundred & suffred few to escape vnwouded. This desafter, & the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes affailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by fea) caused the siege to breakevp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned, he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Micedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with fuch forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed fiege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemie pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibua; whither the Conful (that he might not be quite without worke) had fent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddainely ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all

10 halt, setting their Campe on fire. Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessy) most vulike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by for faking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining Hiftoric of this Warre . For Martius persuaded the Rhodians, by Agefipolis their Pobb.Legatas. Embaffadour, who came to him at Heraelea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselues as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that 20 this was rather a malicious deuice of Martins, craftily feeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their oppoling the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perfeus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet fince he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeit. And fo were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtefie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embaffador, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perfeus, & of Gentius the Illyrian, did fet out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good 30 fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wher-in he had lately flaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde inti- Pohh. Ligat. 87. mated:though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome, to view the estate of Martius his army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall, wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both mony and cloths: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontire of Illyria, so vnable to inuade Macedon, that contrariwife, he was in extreame danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thicher to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made al to halt; or at least, 40 that the Romans with greater loffe, than is before spoken of, had been driven from fome of the Townes which they belieged. Now although it were fo, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himfelfe like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aprly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wifedome, he dealt as a craftesmalter, with a reftlesse working diligence. This indeed neither proued his fufficiencie, nor commended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuerthelesse, out of enuic, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busic headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his country. At such time as Perfeus, by the successe of his doings against Hossilius, had got-

50 ten much reputation, and was thought likely to inuade Theffalie; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduerlitie, whom in prosperitie they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Acheans should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with Rrrrrr 3

the Romans in all danger. So the armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, fent Emballadors vnto Martius, to certific him thereof, and know his pleafure. Polybius found the Conful bufied in feeking paffage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the armie; and awaited the Confuls leifure, till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time convenient, hee presented the Decree, and offered the feruice of his Nation, wherein foeuer it should be commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but faid, that he needed now no maner of helpe. Forthwith! Polybius dispatched home his companions, to fignific thus much: tarrying himselfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius defired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, flue thousand men, to 10 be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable service, by distracting the forces of Perfeis. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius couldnot allow of fuch plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appins had no need of fuch aide: and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wife take order that the men might not bee fent, nor the Acheans be put to fuch needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; muling, and vnable to refolue, whether it were for loue to the Acheans, that the Conful was so carnell in this busines; or rather for enuic, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, fince himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching 29 this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owner felfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Conful, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other fide, that the words by Martius vttered to him in prinat, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleaging that he had no need. In this case therefore, he had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, valesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Conful: by whom it was 33 fure to be made fruitrate. Hereby the Acheans were fauers, of more than an hundred and twentie talents: though Polybius himselferanne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare, lest the fire, which hee himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his ownelodging; or whether the regard of money were able to o. uerswey al other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precifely affirmed any certaintie. One report is, that 40 Eumenes did not fo much as give any helpe to Martius: but comming to have joyned with him, in fuch friendly manner as he did with the former Confuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behind him certaine horse of the Gallogreekes, being requefted to have done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Conful, did the Romans good feruice: then is the reason apparant, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Enmenes, and the loue to Aitslus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing care to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well bee, that couetoulnessed drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. How-50 focuer it befell; Perfeus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to folicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue, betweenea King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrellalike to all Kings, though though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vied the helpe of one againit another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Enmenes; and now Perfeus affailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prufias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to confider, that when Micedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that alreadie they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like fort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, follong as the Roman, could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleafure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to to compell the Romans, to furcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common duemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farreout of the Romans way: and therfore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to bee true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answere; hee began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no leffe weary, than Perfess was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might haue fifteene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this Warre, then would be remaine a Neuter therein; and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condificend vnto peace: 20 and for affurance of his true mouning herein, he offered to give hoftages. Perfeus liked well to receive the hostages, but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this he promifed to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the moneyin the Temple at Samothrace : whence it should be delivered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perfeus his owne ! and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Belides, his labour deserved somewhat, how soever the businesse might happen to succeed : so that needes he would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did 30 no more, than loofe time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor. After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainely, and faid, That without money he could not flirre. Hereunto Perfew loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last cast, to deliver him from all his seares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; fo as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perfew; to the end that all 40 his armie might have comfort, by fuch accesse of strength to their partie. Prefently upon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perfew and Gentius: who defired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betweene Perfess and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martine the Conful was no leffe desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promifed, That they, by their authoritie, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing prowd words, to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadours; gaue an answere, as disdainefull, angrie, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vaine glorie of the Rhodians was throughly challifed; and more throughly should 50 haue beene, if their fubmiffion had not beene as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would have haltened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus, the Micedonian Embaffadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and fea, whileft the Romans were vnprouis ded. But finding what it was that made all to fray; he fent word to Perfeus. Hereupon tenne Talents were fent to Pantauchus: who delinered it to the yong King, as carnelt of that which followed. More followed indeed; and fealed vp with the feale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentus had layed hands vpontwo Roman Embaffadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treafure-bearers, and fent them with their loade to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyred thereto, or not.

Liu. lib.44. Plutarch. in vit, Æmyl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aide of Perseus, under one Clandicus a pettic King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foor, of the Gaules, which were (as Flutarch hath it) the Bastarne. These had before hand made their bargaine, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entrie into the Kingdome, Perfeus fent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whome he promifed to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had fent money to give the fouldiors their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answere. Why then (faid Clondicus) tell thy maister, That the Gaules will not stirre one foot 20 further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perfeus hereupon tooke counfaile: if to veter his owne opinion, before men lo wife that they would not contradict him, were to take counfaile. He made an inuective against the incivilitie and avarice of the Bistarne: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fine thousand horse of them hee said would be as manie as he should need to vie; and not so manie, that he should need to feare them. It had beene well done, if anie of his counfailors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, fince without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out by the way of Parabis, into Theffalie: where walting the Countrey, and filling themfelues with spoile, 32 they should make the Romans glad to for fake Tempe, even for I unger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they worme anie vi-Storie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might have beene alledged, if anie man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had beene with them before, was fent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those manie thoufands that had beene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clendicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those fine thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceived, that Antigonus could make no bester answere, than shifting excuses; the Bastarna retur- 40 ned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perfeus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painefull Office he was verie foone discharged by L. Amylius Paulus the new Conful: who in fifteene dayes after his fetting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Mac:don to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

Y the Warre of Mixedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Whitely though it were not accompanied with anie danger, yet the indignitic for moued them; that either they deered Planch is that Produince to P. Emyllia Paulus, without putting it, as wayotherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Conful; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it voon him than that fo worthie a man was adulanced to the dignitte of a fecond Confullhip 1986 refuled to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that conterned his Province; vn-20 till by Embalfadours, thither fent to view the effate of tille Watte, it was perfectly vinderstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Maredonian, at the present remained. This being throughly knowne to be Tuchian hash beene afred die told; the Senate appointed a fitting fupplie Mot Dhely to the Conful but vnto the Nauje, and likewife to the Armie that fay betweene Historia and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was remotted, and L. Anicias lent thither in his place. Emylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requered those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this Warre, either to accompanie him into Macedon, and there affift him with their adurce ; or elle to governe their 30 tongues at home, and not take vpon them to give directions by heafelay, and cenfure by idle reports: for he told them plainely, Phat he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multisude. The like speech of his father L. Amyliu, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Conne, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was chough to make them conforme themselves the more gladly vito the instructions given by a wise and resolute

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Emplies was honourably attended, at his fetting forth on this journey , with all especial hope of men, that he should finish the Warre: though that he strough finish it to soone and happily, 40 was more than could have beene hoped of imagined. He came to Brandufium : whence, when the winde cathe faire, he let lay lear breake of day, and artined fafely at the Isle of Coreyra before night! Thenethalled beto Debb? where, basing done facrifice to Apollo, after the fift day he fet 18 Polards to the Campe, and was there in fine dayes more. So are there but fine of the fifteene dayes remaining in which he finished the Warre.

Perfeus lay firongly encamped at Diam. having pared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of things, where it was flord and my driewealther. So as there was little hope, or noticed to the him; and confidently as will polfibilitic to enter that way into Mattabl . One great file butenichte troubling the 50 Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vison Dium; was take of fresh water. For there were tetine my les betweene Dum and Tempe, all the way lying betweene the Sea should and the foot of Olympul, without anje Brothe or Spring breaking forth on that fair. But the state of the fair the state of th

no shoare that wants them, though they rife not about the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Attribu from taking up his lodging anie nearer to the enemie, than the Towne of Herades, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleafure, but could performe no feruice of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had fuch meanes to lye close to the Macedonian as it prefently did. the paffage onward, being defended as hath beene thewed, feemed no leffe difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to fearch another way: which by enquirie was foone found out. There was a narrow paffage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of afcent, but flenderly guarded, and therefore promiting a faire journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durft not attempt 10 it : or perhaps could not get his fouldiors to make the aduenture; they fearing leaft it would prove such a piece of worke, as had beene their march over off into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater indultrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, even at his first comming, manie dilorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the fouldiers, among other good leftons, to be obedient and readie in execution; without troubling themselves, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Amylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne lonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabil. 20 Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretains; but his maine firength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, confifted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at fome distance, they might doe notable service against those that should climbe up vnto them; yet when the darkneffe tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the butinesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the fleet; where victuals were prouided for their journey: it being noyfed, that, they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about 30 three dayes.) the Conful made thew of a meaning to fet upon Perfess where hee lav ; rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than you anie hope to doe good, in feeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Chanell of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the prefent it lay welneare all drie, yet it ferued not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Amylius employed none fane his Felites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towe ers which Perfeus had rayled on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, 40 and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Amylius persi-Red ashe had begun; and recontinued his affault, fuch as it could be, the fecond day. This might bane ferued to teach the Macedonian, that some greater worke was in hand: fince otherwise a good Captaine, as Amyling was knowne to be, would not have troubled himselfe with making such bravadoes, that were somewhat costly, But Perfeus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himfelfe no leffe (if not more) amazed than anie of the reft. Order was forthwith given to diflodge ; or rather, without order, in all tu- 50 multuous haft, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedic retreat made to Pyons. Whether it were fo, that they which had cultodie of the pallage were taken fleeping, or whether they were beaten by platter oregister and Eabim had verte good fuccesse in their journey. It may well beating they sleet wrill the Romans came fomewhat neare to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and flings could doe little ferture, were beaten at handle ftroakes: fo as the different relations that are cited by Platarch out of Polybra, and an Epitheof Saqia, may each of them have been effect. This was an open way cleared into Mieclon: which had been effected by Alartias in the years fore going; but was closed vp agains, through his not profecuting for ich an opportunitie.

Perfets was in extreame doubt what course to take, after this vnhappie beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and fo to linger out the Warre: having beene taught by the last yeares example, how resolute the people were in making to defence. But farre worfe countaile prenailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King refolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into anic one Towne, least that should be first of all befreged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not ouer-carefully relieved. This was even the fame that Emylius, or anie invador, thould have defired. So a place was chosen neare vnto Pydna, that serned well for the Phalanx, and had likewife on the fides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There he abode the comming of the enemie; who flaved not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than differetion, had hafted away from them, forfaking the 20 Campe that was to notably well fortified: they defired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting least otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conful; praying him not to loofe occasion by delay. But Amylius told him, That hee spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor anie thing there, faue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these and the like respects, the Consul made a stand; and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe meafured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good leyfure, hee fell o backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the fame day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemie; who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground feruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other fide, the Conful had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Remanaccount) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeare beene Prætor, foretold vnto the Conful, and (with his good liking) vnto the armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiors not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was feene. It was the manner of the Romans, in fuch Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Braffe and Basons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great eafe, and helped her in her labour. But this prognoffication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they faw it verified. Contrariwife, the Macedonians howled and made a great noy se as long as the Eclipse lasted; rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith as with a prodigie betokening their loffe; lince their defire to fight was no whit leffened by it. I will not here nand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signific, or cause, anie alteration in ciuile affaires, and matters that have fmall dependance on natural complexion : for the argument is too large. More worthic of observation it is, how superstition captinates the wildome of the wifelt, where the helpe of true Religion is wanting. *Emplius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernatural thing, nor about the reach of humane underfranding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with anie deuout regard thereof: yet could he not refraine from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with facrifice her delinerie, as foone as the thone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not affift him in this foolith denotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no leffe foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely confumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with anic Sacrifice, and vouchfafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beasts. At 10 length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promife of victoric to Amylius; but with condition, That hee should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had beene better to call vpon the new Goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) vpon Mars the father of Romulus, to whome belonged the guidance of militaric affaires; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaile; Emylim was throughly perfuaded, that the 20 King meant to abide it: for that otherwise hee would not have stayed at. Pydna, when as a little before, his leyfure ferued to retyre whither hee lifted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Conful thought that hee might wait vpon advantage, without making anie great haste. Neyther was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perfew kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Emyline font forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelyhood of fighting that day. But about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which 30 whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer carneft desire. A horse brake loose at watering; which two or three of the Roman fouldiers followed into the riner, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne fide. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrell; and one of the Thracians was flaine. His countrimen feeing this, hasted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had flaine him ouer the river. Hercupon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew fuch, as made it past a fray, and caused both the armies to be carefull of the cuent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaile, accordly as the manner of his Countrie, and the armes, 40 wherewith they served, did require. The ground was a flat levell, saue that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Komans the better fouldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conful encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the leffe maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaile, since hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the facrifice of a coward: whose vnseasonable denotion could be 50 no better than hypocrifie. For hee that will pray for a good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaile, hee found it no better than lost : and he, in looking to his owne fafetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Emylius was thereat much aftonilhed; That the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them flaine, and the fquadrons following them fo discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out adverse to the Romans; and which the Conful beholding, is faid to have rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horfe, had in like manner done his denoyre; the victorie might have bin his owne. That which turned the fortune 10 of the battaile, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, even from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battaillons pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recovled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Conful, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction given by Amyliu, when hee faw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vnequall, and 20 the rankes in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauaileable against manie fmall fquadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of cyno/cephala: yea, this forme of embattailing was found unferuiceable against the other, by reafon, that being not euerie where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though here were little fuch inconvenience of ground, as had beene at * Cyno- * chap.4. $.14

Perfeus, when he faw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle prefently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing 30 the little good feruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercie of the Enemie: who flew about twentie thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost, in that battaile, onely some sourcefcore, or fixfcore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, ouertook the king & his company in a wood; where they fel to railing at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and fuch other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt left they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therfore turned out of the common way, being followed by fuch as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: every one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within 40 a while to lessen. For hee sell to denising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrinke away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella, he found his Pages and houshold servants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnfeafonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. Afterthis, none whom he fent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shortly dare 50 some greater mischiefe; he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him onely Euander (who had beene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about fine hundred Cretians; more for love of his money, than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie talents, though shortly he cozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would have redeemed it; but never paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townslmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would have vttered. But the Amphipoli. tans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselues. Vpon the first same of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towns of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: fending them foorth under colour of againcfull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King; they plainly bade Euander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde In to tarrie: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine veffells that hee found in the river Strymon; paffed over to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to live fafe, by priviledge of the religious Sanctuarie

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amylius, within so few dayes after his victoric. Prdna which was nearest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About fixe thousand of the fouldiours, that were of fundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and confent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer 20 offs against Astrius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in : yeelding themselues and the Towns of Beraa, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Rella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had for faken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such tearmes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armic. Amylius fent abroad into the Countrey, fuch as hee thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found 39 in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while hee shall have

It was soone understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Templeat Samo: Irrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that he wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in tearmes ill beseeming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Persevs to the Conful Pavevs; the Conful, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine 40 the Title, refused to make answere thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheleffe in this conference, hee was maruailous earnest, that hee might bee allowed to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had fo carefully preserved his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with fuch vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yetneglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his defire to liue at case, and bee called King. Yeait feemes that hee had indeede, even from the beginning, a defire to live in this 50 Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the war he was dehorted by his friends, from feeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for *fuch a paltrie lland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eume-

nes demanded, in the holie Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vige him to give place vinto necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so tarre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Oftauius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who affayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole, wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had imprisoned himselfe. When all would not ferue, a question was moued to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiuing into it one that had violated the like holie priviledge of 10 Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and fend word to the King, That Euander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselfe in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holie place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majestie, now past, makes them forbeare to fay, that Perfeus himfelfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auaile, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perfeus therefore willeth Enander to have consideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand, 20 who are like to be presidents and ouerseers of this judgement; so as it were better to die valiantly, fince none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Enander seemes to like well: and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poy fon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had flucke to Perfeus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to for sake him: so as none are left with him, saue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and fay, That the King hath loft the priviledge of this holie 30 Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gaine lay them ?. Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and even that also lyable to dispute, which preserves him from cap-tiuitie; hee purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Semothrace with one shippe; who casily was persuaded to wast the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that hee Platareh in vit. had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his Liu. lib.45. fonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by Liu.lib.42. 40 a rope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his comming to the Sca fide, hee found no

Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian tricke, and was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilest Perseus was fearching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recouer the Temple. Hee ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not fafe to enter it the common way, least he should be taken; hee hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages miffing him, ranne vp and downe making enquirie; till Octavius made proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Mucedonians what soener, abiding with their maister in Samothrace, should have their lives and libertie, with all to them 50 belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewife lon, a Theffalonian, to whome the King had given the

with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better proteefted him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victoric complete. If hee had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Masedon, without other hope of living, than of raigning therein; hee might well have brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by disiding his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrarie hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himfelfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that have beene wretched by their owne default. Hee was presently sent away to Amylius; before whome hee fell to the ground fo basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victorie ouer him- to felfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the leffe to bee effecmed. Emylius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might have beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Persen, he answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Conful tearmed it) almost affurance; for that fuch was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Confuls Table, and respectively entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Q. Alius.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeares continuance : and 20 fuch end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glorie whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated

GENTIVS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Bout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius, had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fistcene thousand; with which hee was at Liffus, readie to affift King Perfew as foone as the money should come, whereof hee had recei-ued onely tenne Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was verie defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, affifted with the Kings presence, made it seems 40 vnpossible to be wonne, in anie not a verie long time. Yet Aniciue was consident in his late victorie; and therefore presented his Armie before the walls, making countenance to give an affault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Towne, would needes iffue forth and fight. They were, it feemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadours; by whome, at first, hee defired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadours, to have recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was 50 no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still aline. Having obtained three dayes respite, hee passed up a River, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to confult the more privately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caranantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent messengers crauing accesse vnto the Prætor: before whome having lamented his follie past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his follie present) he fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, and friends, were prefently given vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill 10 Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from

ò. X.

How the Romans behaued themselues in Greece and Macedon after their victoric over PERSEVS.

Ow began the Romans to fwell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had been evnmannerly toward them before, whilest the Warre with Persons ceemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with bad grace; faying, That they were fent from Rhodes, to make an ouerture of peace; for a fmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no leffe grieuous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and manie others: but that now they were verieglad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did con-30 gratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answere, That the Rhodians had fent this Embassage to Rome, not for love to Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the delire of some (conctous of the charge) to have Warre proclaymed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparrell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; befeeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengcance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene anie whit averle from the Romans in 40 the late Warre of Macedon, were cyther taken and condemned, or fent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for feare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would have done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vetered a milde fentence, and aduertifed the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that *rather the wealth of that Ci- * casar in orat. tie, which they were greedie to ransacke, than anie just cause, had moved them apud Salust. de thereto. This confideration, together with their good deferts in the Warres of line. Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians; among whome, none of anie marke remained alive, save those that had beene of the Roman Faction. All 50 which notwithstanding, manie yeares passed, ere, by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the focietic of the Romans: a fauour which, till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equall friends. With the like, or greater feueritie, did the Romans make themselues tetrible in SIIII 3

all parts of Greece. Amylius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; vifitting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had ouer them. More than fine hundred of the chiefe citizens in Demetrias were flaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with helpe of the Roman fouldiors. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confilcated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Conful, the redreffe was fuch, as requited not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the libertie of their Countrey, he feafted like a King, with excessive cheare; yet so, that hee had all things verie cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be back- 10 ward in fending prouisions, nor fee on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were fent from Rome; fome, to give order for fetling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was viuall in fuch cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Mace. on was fet at libertie by Amylius and the Embassadours, his atsistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this libertie was fuch as the Romans vied to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed vnto the Kings. was leffened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was divided into source parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were fent captine into Italie, with their wines and children, as manie as were aboue fifteene 20 yeares old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated, and new given by Æmylius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue anie inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subjects to Rome; the things done to them could descrue no better name than meere tyrannie, yea and shamelesse perjurie, were it not so that the familiar cultome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were fent to vifit the Greekes, called before them all fuch men of note, from cueric quarter, as had anie way discoucred an unseruiceable disposition towards the Ro- 30 mans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for vsing them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But lince onely two men were believeded, for having beene openly on the Macedonian fide; and fince it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no leffe afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had fold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Acheans these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Commonwealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vn- 40 tractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of figne, by letters, or otherwise, whereby anic one of the Achieuns could be suspitiously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callierates, nor anie of his adherents, had beene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their feruice to the Romans, but onely fuch as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadours neglect to vie the benefit of the time: wherein, fince all men trembled for feare of Rome, the scason serned fitly to ranke the Achaans with the rest. And hereto Callicrates was verie vigent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellowes should be 50 made to pay for their mischicuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embasfadours came among the Achieurs: where one of them, in open affemblic of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. Hee said, That some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perfeus.

This being fo; he defired that all fuch men might be condemned, whom, after fentence giuen, he would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole affembly) what inflice were this? name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, we will foone condemne them. Then faid the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true, faid Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise have beene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answere him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were to the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at kome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited about a thousand; willing them to appeare, and answere before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertic, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison: as men already condemned by the Acheans. Many Embassiages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since 20 honestie had beene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthied among them) to informe the Senat, that these men were neither condemned by the Achaans, nor yet held to be offendours. But in flead of better answere it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that the semen should returne into Achaia. Neither could any folicitation of the Acheans, who never ceafed to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after feuenteene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wife and vertuous man Polybius, the great Hiltorian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or having made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of jayle, after that they were committed thereto, fuffered death

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the fouldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible crueltie; as also it was performed by Amylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leave of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vie the libertie beflowed upon them by the people of Rome; he fent unto the Epirots for tenne of the principall men out of euerie Citie. These hee commaunded to deliver vp all the gold and filuer which they had; and fent along with them, into eueric of their 40 Townes, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed they should fall to sacke, everic one the Towne whereinto hee was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman souldiors; and besides other acts of hostilitie in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epiro's deserved punishment, as having favoured Perfews. But fince they, among this people, that were thought guiltie of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had beene alreadie fent into Italie, there to receive their due; and fince this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present 50 in good obedience, but had, even in this warre, done good fervice to the Romans:

I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleeve it, had anic one Writer delivered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse meruallous, that GoD was pleased to make Amylius childlesse, even in the glorie of his triumph, how great focuer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victorie, with the Greekes and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacie of an Emballage fent from them to Antiochus: whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadors came.

NTIOCHUS the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his raign and life. He died the fix and thirtieth yeare after he had worne a Crown, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Ptelemie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Instine) of Inpiter. dest of Antiochus his sonnes; raigned in Syria twelue yeares, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though to fephus give him but seven. A Prince, who as hee was flouthful by nature, so the great loffe which his father Antiochus had received; tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeares before his birth, Daniel gauethis judgement, Et flabit in loco eius vilisimus & indignus decoreregio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus the father of this man) (ball flart up a vilde person, vir worthy the honor of a King. Vinder this Seleucie, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect. What time as the hely Citie was inhabited with all peace, because of the godlinesse of ONIAs the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King 20 did honor the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King tofeize them; of his miraculous striking by God; and his recourry at the prayers of onics; of the Kings death, and of his fuccessor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Machabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his florie, nor of the acts of his fucceffors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successour of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death 40 of Simen Machabeus (who died in the hundred threescore and seventeenth yeare of the Greekes in Syria) that first book treateth. The Author of the second book, although he take the Storic somewhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeare of the Gracian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, flaine by India: remembring in the fourth Chapter the praetile of Isfon, the brother of Oniss, who after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans fent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greekes, Jonathan the brother and fucceffor of 50 Indas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epiffle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadors, whom hee employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which arius had fent to Onias the High Prieft, whereto Iofephus addes, that the name of the Lacedemonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were scaled with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clawes.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and feuen and thirtieth yeare of the Greekes in Syrie. Hee was the fecond some of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also hee vsurped from his brothers

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nephew by his fifter Cleopatra, being then very yong, 10 had beene about feuen yeares King of Ægypt.

Ptolemic Epiphanes, the father of this King Philometor, had raigned in Agypt foure and twentie yeares; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Micedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them, whilest he was a childe. But they found such other busines, ere long, with the Romans, as made them give over their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Propinces of Calefyria, Phanice, and Indea, which he had wonne by his victoric ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Agyptian forces in those parts. Neuertheleffe, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater securitie. Hee lest 20 behind him two fons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra, Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom the was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such werethe marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he flew her, fell into harred with his subjects, and was like to be chafed out of his kingdome: his yonger brother being fet vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong partie, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing fuccour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the yong Prince, fought by 30 all meanes possible to possesse himselse of that kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnestheus Embassador into Agypt, and vnder colour to assist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouernours of the yong King Philometer, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that kingdomeinto his hands; pretending an extraordinarie care and delire of his Nephewes safetie and well doing. And the better to answere all argument to the contrarie, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he along ft the coast of Syria, to Joppe, and from thence on the fudden he turned himselfe towards Ierufalem, where by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin sit for such a Patron) hee was with all 2.Mar.4. pompe and solemnitic received into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Se-

40 leucus, the brother and predeceffour of Epiphanes, that impious traytor Simon of Macastapa, the Tribe of Beniamin, ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouernor of Calesyria and Phanicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heaven; the said Apollonius being stroken by the Angell of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet fufficed not this example to terrific others from the like vngodly practifes. Presently vpon the death of Seleueus, this Iason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threescore talents of filter, with other rents and summes of money. Mac.1.2.c.4. So he got his delire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughtie dealing of Ialon, and his being ouer-reached by another, in the fame kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Acheans, when as that mischieuous Callierates, who had beene too hard for all worthic and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus.

One fire than other burnes more forcibly, One Wolfe than other Wolues does bite more fore; One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does fly. So one most mischieuous of men before, CALLICRATES, falleknane asknane might be, Wet with MENALCIDAS more falle than be.

And even thus fell it out with Islan: who within three yeares after, was betrayed, and overbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Isfon thereupon being forced to flie To from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites. From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phanicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Agypt; with which, Mac.1.c.1.v.17 and with a mightie armie of land-forces. Hee went about to raigne over Ægypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mightie companie, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Nauie, and moued warre against Ptolemaves King of Egypt, but Ptolemaevs was afraid of him and fled, and many were wounded to death. He wanne many strong Cities, and took away the spoiles of the Dangil, Va4. Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL. He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers have not done, nor 20 ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelusium and the hill Cassius, after which he entered and fackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Agypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that ANTIO. CH v s had smitten Egypt, he turned againe and went up towards I srael and Ierusalem with a mightie people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuarie, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlesticke for the light, and all the Instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the powring Veffels and the Bowles, and the golden Basons, and the Vaile, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Silver, and the Gold, and the 30 precious Iewels, and the fecret Treasures : and when he had taken away all, he departed into bis owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

Polyb.Legat.81.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Calesyria; justifying histitle by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Prouince had not beene configued ouer to the Egyptian, or given in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had alreadie gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaans, Rhodidians, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by seuerall Embassages, to fome good conclusion. But his answere was; that if the Alexandrians could be con- 40 tented to receive their King his Nephew Philometer, the elder brother of the Piolemics, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee faw, that it was an hard peece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers confume themselues with intestine warre, than by the terrour of his armes, threatning destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any defire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the prefent; leaving the Piolemies in very weake estate; the yonger, almost ruinated by his inuation; the elder hated and forfaken by his people.

But how weake soener these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to bee so firong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the profecution thereof; and follow, at 50 good scafure his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch; and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppresse the Rebellion of the Tharsand other in those parts, who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowrie, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis For

Gouernour of Syria in his ablence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Issen out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, comitting the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lyfimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronieus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This he did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised, the same being now by Sostratus cagerly demanded. Hercof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moued 10 with zeale, and detesting the facriledge of Menelaus, hee reproued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuarie at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a fuburb to Antioch. In compasse it had aboutten miles: wherin were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Groue, fweet Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to luit, and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Oniss, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Disna, or to claime priniledge, from the holines of a ground confecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuentence is far lesse, to hold this book as Apocryphall; than to judge this fearefull shift which 20 Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke feemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not faue the life of the poore old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayedhim to flay Macliba.ca.4. ONIAS. Sowhen he came to ONIAS, he counfelled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and perswading him to come out of the Santhuarie; so he slew him incontinently, without any regard of righteousnesses. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, Hee tooke away ANDRONICVS his garment of purple, and rent his cloathes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City, and in the same place where hee had committed the wickednesse against O NI As, hee was Managanas flaine as a murderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should have 30 thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suite of one Ptolemie, a traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, he condemned innocent ment to death; who justly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Veffels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne ourragious will, and not by any regard of justice: since he reuenged the death of Onias, yet flew those that were in the same cause with Onias, Who had they told their cause, Versag.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into £gypt, and then Mac. 2.6.5. v. 1. were there feen throughout all the Citie of Icrusalem, fortie dayes long, hor femen running in the aire with Robes of gold, and as bands of Spearemen, and as troopes of Horsemen set in aray, incountring and courfing one against another. CHAP. 6. S.11.

The fift Booke of the first part

When Liuis was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Henne, holding a Lawrell braunch in her mouth. Linia caused this Henne to be carefully nourifhed, and the Lawrell braunch to be planted: Of the Henne came a faire encrease of white Poultrie, and from the little braunch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: fo that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vie to carrie in their hands a braunch of Bayes taken out of this Groue; and after the Triumphs ended, to fet it againe in the same ground: which braunches were observed, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those 10 persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeare of 2Vero, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cafars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke fuch strange signes to be vinworthic of regard; it appeares by their calling vpon G o D, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Agypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein raigning: fo was his fecond Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not firong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power 20 of their vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perfualion than by armes. Phylcon had not as yet forgotten the terrour of the former fiege; the Alexandrines though they loued not Philemeter, yet loued they worfe to liue in fearcitie of victuals (which was alreadic great among them. and like to grow extreame) fince nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother faw no likelyhood of good iffue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and about all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he flood of his vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out 30 of Egypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Agypt, to his owne vie. This confideration wrought also with Physican, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their fifter, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that hee had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subject his yonger brother vnto him, which he gaue in answere to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently fur- 40 nished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Armie into Calesyria, readic to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thankes to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to befeech him, That he would rather be pleafed to fignific what hee required to have done in Agypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemie with fo puilfant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answere, That he would neither call backe his Fleet, nor withdraw his Armic, vpon anie other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelulium, the whole Territorie thereto belonging and that 50 hee should also abandon and leave vnto him the Isle of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answere vnto these demaunds, hee fet downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without anie accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recoursed as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Agypt it selfe; for Alemphis and all about it received Antiochus, being vnable to refilt him. The King having now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by eatie journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Agypt flood; the Romans had notice long agoc. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to entermeddle therein. For it was a civill warre: and wherein Antiochus feemed to take part with the juster caule. Yet they gaue fignification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to have the Kingdome of Agypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doc; being troubled with Perfess; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too faire. Neuerthelesse, the Agyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to bee expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene fustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hinnibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Agyptian, had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes beene desended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for fundric people abroad, ill followed or feconded, by other as bad in requitall : but with continuance of futable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers fent abroad confidently for ayde: especially to the Rhodians and Acheans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans, Physicon and Cleopatra had fent, a yeare fince: but their Embaffadours lay still in Rome. Of the Acheans they defired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warriour might be fent to them as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Acheans readily condescended : and would immediatly 30 haue made performance; if Callierates had not interposed his mischieuous arte. Hee, whether feeking occasion to vaunte his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose service the Kings desired; withflood the common voice, which was, That their Nation should not with such fmall numbers as were requelted, but with all their power, be aiding vnto the Ptolemies. Por it was not now (hee faid) convenient time to entangle themselves in any fuch businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans what helpe soeuer should be required in the Macedonian watre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that AO Martius the late Conful had fignified vnto him, that the Romans were past all need of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their benefactours, the Agyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any service to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could, without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate, and to labour, as the Senate had 50 done, by fending Embassadors, to set Agypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was esfected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the Tttttt fame kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends durst not gaine-say the Roman Councell; which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perfeus ouercome: and then might the Embaffador fent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Physicon and Cleopatra; which having stayed more then a whole yeare in the Citic, brought nothing of their bulineffe to effect vntill now. The Embalfadours deliuered their meffage in the name of those that had sent them : though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no leffe than his brother 10 and fifter.

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from fuch as it had bin before three or four yeares last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedonian warre; either he, or Euleus and Leneus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not only he determined to fet you Antiochus, for Cwiefyria; but would have interposed himselfe between the Romans and Perfeis, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Emballador was by a friend perswaded, to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, he fell on the sudden, by the 20 rebellion of his brother and subjects, to live vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by attonement with his brother and subjects, hee might have feemed to ftand in no need of fuch protection; he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to faue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and fifter, shewed it selfe even in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorely cladde; the haire of their heads and beards ouer-growne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliuc. Thus they entered into the Senate; and there fell groueling and proftrate vpon the floare. Their garments were not fo meane and mournefull, nor their 39 lookes and countenances fo fad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey flood; they made a pitifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, befeeching them to have compaffion of their effate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They faid that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of fuch account and authoritie, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Armic out 40 of Agypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time or yfed any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonor to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extreame dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchfafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours, to determine and end the warre between those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surccassed and gaue over Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to 50 the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after. Whilest

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Egypt, Satiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neare was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greeting and falutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Role of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while confidered of the businesse, hee tolde Populius, That hee would aduife with his friends, and then give the Embassadours their answere. But Populus, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which he held in his hand, willing him to make him fuch an answere as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King aftonished at this fo rude and violent a Commaundement, after hee had flayed and pawfed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to doe what socuer the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the

Thus Antiochus departed out of Agypt, without anic good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: Dan. cap. 11. yea, fulfilling cueric particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mif. vers. 29,30.00 20 chiefe to Jerufalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene histotified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed a while, and settled the Kingdome of Agypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother, and appointing the younger to raigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had alreadie giuen an ouerthrow to the Agyptian shippes.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards EVMENES, PRUSIAS, MASANISSA, and COTYS. The end of PERSEUS and his children. The instabilitie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of PAVLYS, ANICIVS, and OCTAVIVS. With the Conclusion of the Worke.

Y this peremptoric demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message. and by the readic obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceive how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conqueft of Macedon. The fame Popilius had beene well contented, a yeare before this, to lay afide the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to give good language to the Acheans and Ætolians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre leffe power than the King Antiochus. Likewife, Antiochus had with good wordes, and no more than good wordes, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in fuch fort, as they complained not, much leffe vsed anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

50 Eumenes fent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victoric over Perfeus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallogreekes, which molested him. Verie welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bad him be consident, and request of the Senate

hopefull promifes tickled Attalus with fuch ambition, that hee eyther approued. or feemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaymed by the faithfull counfaile of Stratius a Phylician; whome Eumenes had fent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene fent; recounted his owne feruices done to the Romans in the late Warre, *wherewithall he forgat not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requested, That the Townes of £nus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himselfe. * By his omitting to fue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, 10 that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him understand how gracious hee was, they not onely graunted all his defire; but in the prefents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embaffadours that came with an acceptable meffage) they vied fingular magnificence. Neuertheleffe, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had alreadic graunted. This did so highly eifplease the Senate, that whilest hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Anus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promife; which otherwise they could not without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallogreekes, which were about to inuade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they fent Embaffa- 20 dours to them, with fuch instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate beeing so manifest : Eumenes thought it worthie of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the follie of his fecond voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: fince, by his malice to Perfeus, hee had tayed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne dores. No fooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to fend him going. It was not thought expedient to vie him as an enemie, that came to visit them in loue: neyther could they, in so doing, have anoided the note of fingular inconstancie; and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would per- 30 mit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof lent him home, without expence of much further

Prusias King of Bishynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behave himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or defire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kiffed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and sauiours: as also hee yied to weare a Cappe, after the manner of flaues newly manumifed, prof: fling himfelfe an enfranchifed bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeede naturally a flaue, and one that by fuch abject flatteric kept himfelfe 40 fafe: though doing otherwife greater mischiefe than anic wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, belides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would have beene vnjust hee received a cold answere. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was undertaken by the Senate; which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Ægypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Masanista held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more affured. In all controucrises they gave judgement on his tide: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay fine bundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due fo long. Now indeede had Rome good leyfure to deuile vpon the ruine of Carthage : after which, the race of Masanissa himselfe was thortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. Hee fent to Rome one of his fonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Perfeus; and offered to come thi-10 ther himselfe, there to facrifice for joy vnto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his fonne rewarded; and hee entreated to flay

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadours, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him given to Perfews, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his fonne, which was taken with the children of Perfeus, might be fet at libertie for conuenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; tince hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giving hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ransome-free; with admonition, to carrie himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His King-20 dome lay betweene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappie Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were ledde through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Amylius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suite to Amylius, that hee might not be put to fuch differace: but hee still received one skornefull answere, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himfelfe. And furely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, hee would rather have fought his death in Macedon, than have beene beholding to the courtesse of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman 30 clemencie, whereof Amylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had beene ledde in chaynes through the firectes, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remayned without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe facrifice, hee should command the captines to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were ouercome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus: yet so, that hee had little joy of his life; but eyther familhed himfelfe, or (for it is diuerfly reported) 40 was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of fleepe. Of his fonnes, two died, it is vncertaine how. The youngest called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Tura ner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such pouertie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eightscore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perfeus had knowne it before, that his owne sonne should one day bee compelled to earne his living by handie-worke, in a painefull Occupation; it is 50 like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignetic, haue commaunded those poore men to be slaine, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been verie gentle, and would haue confidered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most undertroden wretches, are all subject vnto One high Power, gouerning all alike with absolute command.

But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as yee would be done unto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

Euen they that have no murdrous will, Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controlle: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. Goo, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted fuch power to verie few: among whome alfo, verie few there are, that vie it not to their owne hurt. For who fees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (befides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not manie excellent Princes, not with standing their brotherhood, or other nearenesse in bloud, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot, that governes one, the most vinworthic of his whole 20 house, yet raigning overall? The vntimely death of manie Princes, which could not humble themselues to such flatterie; and the common practise of the Turkish Emperours, to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Hereto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the fecond; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemie, to exercise the fame vpon the Line of that vnhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish 30 the transitoric Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceine and teach, That * GOD is the forest and sharpest Schoolemaister, that can be deuised, The true Law for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controlment to turne it upfide-downe at their pleasure.

Chap. 3. 5.4.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Amylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootic. So great was the 40 quantitic of Gold and Siluer carried by Paulus into the Romen Treasurie, that from thenceforth, vntill the civile Warres, which followed vpon the death of Iulius Casar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have beene hindered by the fouldiors; who grudged at their Generall, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiors herein, and brought them to reason by seuere exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased God to take away from him his two remayning fonnes, that were not given in adoption: of which, the one died fine dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes 50 after it. This loffe hee bore wifely: and told the People, That hee hoped to fee the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victoric was requited with his owne private calamitic, in stead of the publike.

CHAP. 6.5.12. of the Historie of the World.

About the same time, Octavius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentrus prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embaffages from all parts; and Kings, either viliting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to vilit her, and doe their duties in perfon ; were enough to fay vnto Rome, Sume Superbiam, Take vpon thee the Maiestie, that thy deferts have purchased.

 $B^{\gamma}$  this which we have alreadic fet downe, is feene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted vp, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shal beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient Historics, which have beene preserved, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of fo many tragicall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men hauc complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, the greatest Lords of the world have beene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it to much vexation, and fo many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vie at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourse, understood by them 30 which are diffolued; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stolne out of the world without noise; than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression and crueltie, by giving in spoile the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with fo many and fo variable forts of forrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germaines, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there bath beene no State fearefull in the East, but that of the Turke; nor in the Westany Prince that hath spred his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard, who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the 40 Moores out of Gransdo, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerful. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as have beene spent by the English, French, and Neatherlands in a defensive war, and in diuctions against them, it is casic to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thou fand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to line in peace, but all their swelling and ouerstowing streames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old bankes. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one 30 feeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spaine. For the reft, if we lecke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundleffe ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath been already faid;

That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwayes laid before them, the actions, but not the ends, of those great Ones which præceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they never minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counfell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdome of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth not infuse. Death which hateth and destroyeth man, is believed; Go p which hath made him and loues him, is alwayes deferred. I have confidered (faith SALOMON) all the workes that are under the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie and vexetion of (pirit : but who believes it, till Death tells it vs. It was Death, which open ning the conscience of Charles the fift, made him enjoyne his some Philip to reflore Nauarre; and King Francisthe first of France, to command that justice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then be neglected. It is therfore Death alone that can fuddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, even to hate their forepassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the gravell that filles his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them 20 fee therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just and mightic Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none bath dared, thou halt done; and whom all the world hath flattered. thou only hast cast out of the world and despised : thou hast drawne together all the farre firetched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic incet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calles it selfe, The first part of the Generall Historie of the World, implying a Second, and Third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewen out; belides many other discouragements, per-fwading my silence; it hath pleased GoD to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspeakable and neuer enough lamented loffe, hath taught mee to fay with I o B. Verfaest in Luctum Citha. ramea, & Organum meum in vocem

To the Reader.

He wee of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to anic length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: fince they cannot, like Annales, yearely fet downe all Occurrences not coherent. This here following, may ferue as an Index to the prefent Part of this Worke; pointing unto the feuerall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are farre distoyned in the Relation. Certainely

it is not perfect : neither doe I thinke, that anie can be. For how focuer the yeares of the first Patriarchs may seeme to have beene well-neare compeat, yet in the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, wee finde manie fractions, and the last yeare, or yeares, of one King reckoned also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in manic other; though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the diverse and imperfect formes of the yeare, which were in efe among fundrie Nations: causing the * Summer Mone: hs, in proceffe of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding ex- * See Lib.2. treame confusion in the reckoning of their times . Neither is it a small part of trouble, Chap. 3. S.6. to chuse, out of so manie, and so veterly disagreeing computations, as have alreadie gotten authoritie, what may probably be held for truth . All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleaged, in excuse of such error as a more intentine and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serve to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane indgement) from anie notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to lu fice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for Come errors of the Presion the numbring of yeares, but for some hassie mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to have bereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to bis owne cafe.

The Titles over the Columnes, have reference to that which followes under them; as will readily be conceived. Where two Titles, or more, are over the head, as | Rome Nationalitar | there doe the numbers underneath answere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Icrus ilem were finished in the 219. yeare from the building of Rome, and in the 314 from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be and riftood, That IEHOSOPHAT began bis raigne in the 2774. of the IVLIAN Era in the 3092 of the World, and in the 99 yeare of the Temple. This needes not more illustration; nor indeede so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To anote profesitie, I have forborne to infer; those yeares, which I finde not figned with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Raigne; some change of Government; some Battaile fonght; or thelike. So, of the 13. yeares wherein SYLVIVS CAPETUS raigned over the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of I EHOSOPHAT, wherein CAPETVS began, onto the 17, wherein SYLVIVS A-VENTINUS Succeeded, and wherein I EHORAM first raigned with I EHOSOPHAT bus father. For I thought it vaine to have filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and fe fill onwards, till I had come to the first of AVEN-TINVS, and 17. of IEHOSOPHAT. In fetting downe the Kings, there is noted over the head of cuerie one, what place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the firly fecond, fift, feuenth, or fo forth, in ranke, of those that rigned in his Countrey, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeare of his raignes, at the end, or foot of the name (as the space giues leave) is the whole number of yeares in which he raigned; in the faces following underneath are those yeares of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeare of anie remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there is it to be understood, that the Same yeare belonged, not oncly to the King then beginning, but whio some one, or more, of his fore.goers: as the first yeare of I i ii o n n n King of I stall was the same with the seemad his brother A ii a z i a, and the 22 of his father A ii a n. So, where two or three anote are sound in one sheet; as in the 2077, yeare of the World, Z linki, T ii is ii, and O m i i it is meant, that enerie one of them raigned in some part of the same yeare; which is reckoned the second of E i a, and the siril of O m i. Particularly, what the stave of the Egyptian Kings are set downer the years of the So N A S I i is, which it will thought meet to insert; as likewise, otherwhiles, the day of the month upon which N a i o n A s s a is yeare began: which, how it varied from other yeares, may be sound in the place lest above either.

Concerning the Ara, or accompt of yeres, from I P HITVS, who began the Olympiads, from R ome Coult, from N A N ON A S S A R, and the like; as much as was thought connenient hith beene field, where due place was, in the Booke it felfe: fo as it remained onely to note, that winder the title of Olympiads is fet downe fift the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year e of that Olympiad; as that C v R v s began his raigne in Persia,

Now, for that the yeares of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONAS-SAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columnes; opposing part of the one yeare to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all ouerthwart with one streight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour hane I spared, as more troublesome than weefull; since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and fince the learned might well be without it. It will onely be needfull to observe, that how soener the Era of the Olympiads be 24. yeares elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of NABONASSAR, yet the raigne of some King may have begun at such a time of the yeare as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning : the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explane all. Queene ELIZABETH began her raigne the 17 of November, in the yeare of our LORD 1558: Shee was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it up; threw downe Images; and reformed manie things in Religion: all in her first yeare: yet not all in that yeare 1558, but the greater part in the yeare following; whether we begin with the first of Ianuarie, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table; but to, as the difference is never of a whole

The IVLIAN Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the yeares of the World, was deailed by that honorable and excellently learned IOSEPHSCALIGES.

The being accommodated to the VILIAN years, now in Vigenmong vs. It conflicts of 7980 yeares; which refult from the multiplication of 19.28, and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeares of an Indiction. Being duided by anie of the fee, it leaves the number of the prefent yeare; or if no fraction remainer, it fixes the the feed to feel the type of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498, of this Period, when was fought the great battaile of Canna, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sunne 18, and confequently the Dominical letter F. as may be found by duiding the fame number of the IVLIAN Period 4498, by 10. for the Frime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period 4498, by 10. for the Frime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period 4498, the prefent accompt, always exceeds the years of the World by 682. Befides the former vfer, and other thence redounding, it is abotter Churalter of a yeare, than anie other Era (us From the beginning of the World, From the Floud, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more vneurtaine position.
